Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman acknowledge the very real difficulties of beef farmers in north-east Wales? Can he guarantee my constituents easy access to abattoirs as they try to cope with the problem? Finally, will he consider an invitation from me to visit Pwll farm in Treuddyn, where Mr. Idris Roberts, who is the leader of Flintshire National Farmers Union, could give him a reasonable and helpful tutorial on these matters?

Mr. Hogg: That is a kind offer—the only problem is that I have no departmental responsibility for agriculture in Wales and, therefore, I might trespass on the ground of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

There are two different points relating to abattoirs and the availability of spaces within them. In respect of slaughtering under the accelerated cull, I do not anticipate any difficulty with finding ready slots for slaughtering cattle under that scheme. In respect of the over-30-months scheme, there were delays and I shall not try to pretend otherwise. I am glad to say that the backlog has now been cleared and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's constituents should be having any current difficulty with finding slots for the slaughter of their beasts. If I am wrong on that point, the hon. Gentleman should talk to my hon. Friend the Minister of State and we shall see what we can do to help.

Sir Jim Spicer (West Dorset): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept the thanks of the farming community, both in my constituency and in the west country as a whole, for the way in which the herculean task of dealing with more than 1 million cattle so far has been tackled and especially for achieving a figure of more than 60,000 in the past few weeks? Does he agree that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) does not understand the position that we were in a few months ago? If he had been a west country farmer, facing the prospect of 102 cattle still caught in the backlog of the 30-months cull, the last thing he would have wanted would have been a Minister coming forward with a scheme like this. We had to get the backlog cleared before moving on.

Does my right hon. and learned Friend also agree that the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) misses the point when he asks why we cannot act quickly? All my constituents want some flexibility, because they are coming up to the end of the quota year. In the interests of the farming community, we must have flexibility in the way in which we deal with this problem.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind observations. I am well aware, from a spirited meeting that I attended in the west country, of the concern felt by farmers in my hon. Friend's constituency and elsewhere about the backlog. I am glad that we have been able to clear the backlog. My hon. Friend is right to say that by clearing the backlog we have brought about a change in sentiment within the farming industry. Previously, it was hostile to the cull. I believe that farmers, generally speaking, now want us to carry out the cull.

On the question of flexibility, my hon. Friend is again right to say that that is important. In those cases where we are contemplating culling a substantial number of cattle from a single herd, we shall try to do it in at least two tranches.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Many hon. Members are hoping to catch my eye, so briefer questions and brief answers would be welcome and helpful.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): Is the computerised tracing scheme that the Minister is setting up in Great Britain comparable with the one that already exists in Northern Ireland? Will he explain how his statement today will impact on the beef industry in Northern Ireland where, I believe, most herds will qualify almost immediately for the certified herd scheme? Will he also explain the implications for the flagged holdings in Northern Ireland, specifically suckler herds? Will he give an undertaking that arrangements for the cull will be better than those for the 30-months scheme?

Mr. Hogg: I imagine, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will want me to concentrate on what I judge to be the core of the hon. Gentleman's question, which is the significance of the statement to Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity very soon to study the discussion document or consultation paper on certified herds and he will see two matters of particular relevance to Northern Ireland. First, the criteria to determine which animals are capable of being classified as certified herds will be met by many herds and cattle in Northern Ireland. Secondly, when it comes to proving eligibility—that will be an absolutely essential part of the scheme—Northern Ireland is extremely well placed, by reason of its computer-based system, to achieve that. I cannot think of any part of the United Kingdom that is better placed to meet the criteria than is Northern Ireland and I can think of no part of the United Kingdom that is likely to make more rapid progress in satisfying the criteria than is Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. and learned Friend has just been talking about Northern Ireland. I understand that the selective cull there could go through very quickly. If so, we would then discover our European partners' bona fides in respect of lifting the ban. Is it not a question of hastening the process in Northern Ireland and then thinking again about whether we should pursue the cull more widely?

Mr. Hogg: I would not commend that course of action to my hon. Friend, for the following reason. He will remember that, at the end of my statement, I said that, in my view, a commitment to the selective cull is an essential, indispensable precondition to making any progress. I do not think that we would secure any progress if the cull to which we committed ourselves was partial or regional. Consequently, the cull that we are proposing is UK-wide and will be carried out UK-wide. The application regarding certified herds is couched in UK-wide terms, but the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) and my hon. Friend will have heard what I just said about Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is not it clear that such a scheme, especially for England, would be extremely difficult and time-consuming to impose? There is no base line, and there are certainly no existing arrangements that would meet the conditions that are found specifically in Northern Ireland, and also in Scotland, at present.

Does the Minister accept that he has demonstrated this afternoon that European countries with large agricultural industries have no intention of helping us while they are supplying our markets and have no intention of listening to anything from the scatter-gun approach that he suggests today?

Mr. Hogg: What the hon. Lady is saying is something like this: that the certified herd scheme will not be applicable to very many herds in England, and she has a point. There are at least three areas, however, on which she may not have fully focused. The first is the beef assurance scheme. Cattle which fall within the beef assurance scheme will, by definition, qualify under the certified herd scheme, provided that at the material date they are not more than 30 months of age. Secondly, we have had cattle passports as from 1 July—about 713,000 have been issued thus far—and that is a good basis for matching cattle with our confirmed case computer base. Moreover, in respect of some herds in which cattle have never moved from the natal herd, we shall be able to satisfy the eligibility criteria, but it will be easier in Northern Ireland than it is in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there will be considerable disappointment that we are going ahead with the selective cull without obtaining firm and copper-bottomed guarantees as to when the export ban will be lifted? Many of us do not trust our European friends and we believe that they will keep the ban going for year after year. What happens if we complete the cull and they still refuse to lift the ban? May I suggest that the only way in which we shall get any success is to tell them that, if they do not lift our ban after we have spent £3.2 billion, we shall ban their beef from being imported into this country?

Mr. Hogg: I understand my hon. Friend's position, but it has always been so. The Florence agreement did not provide for a timetable. Perhaps I may put the argument the other way round: if we do not commit ourselves to a selective cull, there will certainly be no progress.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): The Minister talked about the cattle passport scheme, and I believe he mentioned the figure of 713,000 passports. Does that scheme meet in every respect the provisions in the Florence arrangement, which talks about an animal identification scheme? Does it meet the provisions throughout the United Kingdom or is it more likely to meet them in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman has given me an opportunity to correct one error that I made. I said 713,000; I should have said 751,000, and I apologise.

The cattle passport scheme does meet the requirements of Florence. We shall improve it. As the hon. Gentleman may know, on 10 December I published a consultation document on a computer-based traceability system, which will be an enhancement on the paper-based system and will be run in a way that is compatible with proposals made by the European Commission. On the narrow question that the hon. Gentleman asked, namely, is our identification now up to scratch, the answer is yes, and it is better than is to be found in most European states.

Sir Wyn Roberts (Conwy): Am I right in thinking that, in last month's Opposition day debate on BSE, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) gave a strong commitment to supporting the cull? Has my right hon. and learned Friend had a renewal of that commitment?

Mr. Hogg: My right hon. Friend makes a fair point, which is one of the reasons why I said that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) was less than gracious in his response to my statement. The hon. Gentleman will remember the intervention that I made in his winding-up speech, when he gave a categorical commitment to support the selective cull.

Dr. Strang indicated assent.

Mr. Hogg: I see he is nodding. That is good of him, but I am bound to say that we have got it down and will keep it in evidence against him.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): The Minister has made it clear that he does not have European agreement to the further slaughter. How confident is he that his fellow Ministers in the European Community will agree with the methodology involved in targeting those specific animals? Are not we now in the worst of all worlds—where we have no European agreement and the Minister does not truly believe in the programme? When the Minister is reduced to doing something that he does not believe in, is not it time that he went and made way for someone who knows what he is doing?

Mr. Hogg: We do have agreement as to the concept that underpinned the figure of 128,000. Those concepts, which were set out in the eradication programme that we submitted, were approved at the time of the Florence agreement. So we have agreement on the point of the three cohorts plus the voluntary cohort. We shall have to form a view on whether there will be an attempt to add to those numbers on account of "maternal transmission" when we have better evidence from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee in spring 1997.

The hon. Gentleman says that I do not agree with the programme. That is not true. I well understand why several hon. Members wish that we could have a timetable. I accept that it is difficult to justify a cull in scientific terms—it will not improve public health—but one must stand back and ask oneself a different question: whether, if we do not have a cull, we shall make progress. In the absence of a selective cull, we shall make no progress, and on that basis I defend it.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): The Minister made it clear that at first there was opposition to the Florence cull. Can he confirm that no opposition came from the Ulster Farmers Union, which backed an immediate culling? He also told the House that Northern Ireland would be in a very favourable position. If that is so, is he prepared immediately to propose to Agriculture Ministers that Northern Ireland should be made a special case? Will he take from the Prime Minister a letter delivered to him by myself and the leader of the SDLP, which made it clear that the German Minister of Agriculture was now of a mind to change his view and support Northern Ireland as a special case?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the farmers of Ulster have always supported a cull, for reasons such as those that underpinned the question asked by the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross). We shall, as expeditiously as we can, go to the European Commission and, through it, the Standing Veterinary Committee and the other experts, with our full working document, which will set out our concept of a certified herd scheme, which will be UK-wide in its application. I do believe, however, for the reasons that I mentioned to the hon. Member for East Londonderry, that Northern Ireland is very well placed to satisfy the eligibility criteria and—even more to the point—to have that satisfaction of the criteria established positively, so that the European Union can be satisfied that it is valid.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): First, if we can have a cattle passport scheme, when can we have a passport scheme for pets? Secondly, what is the total cost of the BSE eradication scheme to date, including compensation, transport, slaughter, rendering and incineration?

Mr. Hogg: On the first question, the hon. Gentleman must wait on events. On the second question, the overall cost committed—not money spent, but committed over the relevant periods set out in the documents—is slightly more than £3 billion.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): May I endorse the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Sir J. Spicer), and the broad thrust of his question? What my farmers require is a greater degree of certainty. Can my right hon. and learned Friend tell me when the selective cull will come into effect? I do not want to know the end date; I want to know when it will begin. Can my right hon. and learned Friend also tell me the operative date for deciding the market value of any particular beast?

Mr. Hogg: We intend valuation to be taken as at the day of valuation, which will give a degree of certainty.

[Mr. Hogg]

As my hon. and learned Friend will see in the consultation document, however, we have contemplated the possibility of some other date, and if people want to argue in favour of some other date we shall manifestly take their representations into account.

When the culling will start rather depends on whether the House wants to debate the compensation order. I anticipate that it may want to do so, but I do not suppose that that will happen until the latter part of January. We cannot slaughter until we have debated the order, if that is the will of the House, and get approval if we do so; but we might be in a position to start the slaughter in February or early March.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I welcomed the rather belated statement about the selective cull, but has the Minister learnt any lessons from the over-30-months scheme, which involved huge backlogs in parts of north Wales? The Minister might have to look again at the overall structure of the scheme that he is introducing. I was very disturbed by his earlier comment that some parts of the United Kingdom would make more rapid progress than others: that does not sound to me like uniformity.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman has made a number of points. The reference to rapid progress was actually a reference to the fact that Northern Ireland is particularly well placed to satisfy the criteria, and also to prove that the criteria have been satisfied. As for the accelerated cull programme, I do not anticipate any difficulty in ensuring rapid slaughter. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, we raised the slaughter capacity in regard to the over-30-months scheme to 60,000 a week. It has now plummeted, and there is now a good deal of capacity to enable us to carry out that slaughter.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): My right hon. and learned Friend has been candid enough to say on a number of occasions that there is no scientific justification for the extended cull, but that it is necessary to get the ban lifted. Will he elaborate for a moment or two on the logic of saying that it is better to carry out the cull and then hope that our so-called partners will take mercy on us than simply to say, "If we do this, will you lift your ban?"? Would our partners not be more likely to take notice of our position if we said, "We will co-operate in this way if you give us an assurance that you will lift the ban; alternatively, we will consider measures of our own, such as insisting that imports of foreign beef are subjected to the same stringent health conditions as our own beef"? Would not a package of that sort be more likely to achieve the result towards which my right hon. and learned Friend has been working for so long?

Mr. Hogg: I recognise that my hon. Friend has a great deal of experience of negotiation. I have been engaged in this particular business for six or seven months, and I owe it to the House to give the best opinion that I can give on how we are likely to make progress most effectively.

I have taken into account, and explored, possibilities such as those outlined by my hon. Friend, and have finally reached the clear conclusion that, unless we give this commitment to the selective cull, we shall not make any progress of any kind. That is the advice that I give the House, but it is, of course, for the House to make its own judgment.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): The Minister already knows that we have a certified 97 per cent. herd traceability in Northern Ireland. He also knows that the over-30-months cull was completed this week, and that the accelerated cull could be completed in a matter of weeks. That means that Northern Ireland has fulfilled all the Florence requirements, or will certainly have done so by the middle of January.

May I ask the Minister to clarify his earlier answers? Does that mean that, because it has qualified under all those headings, the ban will be lifted from Northern Irish beef? If not, why not? Is the Minister aware that Commissioner Fischler and the chairman of the Committee of Agriculture Ministers are simply waiting for the British Government to make that request to them, and will he make that request?

Mr. Hogg: I should be a little cautious about interpreting exactly what the position is, but let me make the situation plain once more. The application in respect of certified herds will be UK-wide, and I hope that we shall be in a position to put the relevant papers to the Commission at the end of January or the beginning of February. The hon. Gentleman will recall that he himself said that the position in Ulster would not have met all the criteria until the middle of January. We will then engage in discussions with the European Commission and within the Standing Veterinary Committee, but I believe that Northern Ireland will find it relatively easy to meet the criteria, and that it is uniquely well placed to prove that they have been met.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): I assure my right hon. and learned Friend that his announcement will be greeted warmly by farmers in Northumberland, who will see it as the start of a long process rather than an end in itself. Today is not the occasion on which to threaten our European partners with what might happen in the future.

May I ask a technical question? If there is a disagreement about value, will an appeal mechanism be available to farmers?

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has considerable knowledge of these matters.

There are three possible valuation methods. First, the farmer agrees to the appointment of a valuer by the Ministry, and he will fix the valuation. Secondly, a valuer will be appointed by the farmer and the Ministry, allowing the possibility of an agreed valuation. Failing that, the chairman of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors can appoint a valuer, and that valuation is agreed to be final. To that extent there is an appeal mechanism, but it is by way of reference to an independent valuer appointed by the chairman of the RICS.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): We still need a clear answer from the Minister about the British Government's position in relation to Northern Ireland. He will know that about 1,700 cattle must be slaughtered there to meet the Florence criteria. If, after that has been achieved, the European Commission acknowledges—whether to the

Select Committee, which is now taking an interest in the matter, or to any other reputable organisation, which I hope includes the British Government—that Northern Ireland has met the criteria, will the British Government then ask for the ban on Northern Ireland's beef to be lifted? That is what we need to know.

Mr. Hogg: I think that the hon. Gentleman slightly misunderstands the process. Let me begin by establishing a small point of fact. The number of cattle to be slaughtered under the accelerated cull scheme in Northern Ireland is now substantially less than 1,700; a good many have gone under the over-30-months scheme.

We will come forward with an application to the Commission, and through the Commission to the Standing Veterinary Committee, and thereafter to other expert committees. It is possible that the application will go back to the Council, but I hope that it will not. That will be in respect of certified herds UK-wide. We must then see what the response is. I hope that we shall be able to secure a lifting of the ban that is not confined to Northern Ireland—that we shall be able to satisfy the Commission that there are herds in Scotland, for example, that may meet the criteria as the Commission would want, and also, perhaps, in England and Wales. It will be a hard negotiation, but I will not stand artificially in the way of progress. I want to see progress.

Sir Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): Will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that some of the farmers who have been especially hard hit by the cull will receive extra-generous compensation for the disruption that they will obviously suffer?

Mr. Hogg: We have already made available to producers a narrow line of aid of the order of £263 million or £264 million. Some £50 million from the October Council is still undetermined and I anticipate a high degree of national discretion about how that money is spent, albeit it is EU money.

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The Minister told the House that both the slaughter and disposal of the 1 million cattle were complete. How many cattle have been disposed of by incineration and how many have been disposed of by landfill and where are they? Is it right that several thousand tonnes of cattle are still in storage throughout the country awaiting disposal?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Lady is right. We have slaughtered about 1,080,000 under the over-30-months scheme and have not yet been able to dispose of all the carcases. The only way in which we could increase the throughput to 60,000 a week was to substantially increase the cold storage capacity. We have been taking out the specified bovine material and disposing of it immediately and putting the rest of the carcases into cold storage to await the opportunity to render and dispose of them in the appropriate way.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): If the Minister chooses any additional abattoirs to deal with the selective cull will he ensure that a transparent procedure is implemented for choosing them? There is a great deal of grievance in the industry because abattoir owners believe that those which were selected for the 30-months-scheme were chosen under a system of secrecy.

Mr. Hogg: It is indeed desirable to have greater transparency and we shall therefore proceed to an open tender system in the new year.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is not it important for the House to know that the animal traceability system and the animal identification scheme which exist in Northern Ireland and which will facilitate an early raising of the ban there are precisely those that the Government rejected in 1990 when they were recommended by the Select Committee on Agriculture? Such a scheme was also rejected when it was proposed in amendments to the Bill that led to the Agriculture Act 1993 and in a recommendation in 1995 by the Select Committee on Agriculture. If the Northern Ireland scheme had been implemented throughout the kingdom over the six years that the Opposition have been demanding it, we would not be in the mess that we are in today.

Mr. Hogg: One must always take into account proportionality and the scientific opinion of the time. In the computer-based system that we are discussing we envisage about 40 million movements being recorded. That is hugely in excess of what is recorded on the Northern Ireland computer base and it would require positive justification. With the advantage of hindsight, one can construct a case, but taking account of the scientific judgment at the time the decisions that were taken were correct.

Point of Order

5.24 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw to your attention pages 121, 122 and 129 of "Erskine May", which advise on what constitutes contempt of the House in respect of remarks made or printed outside the House? My complaint relates to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), whom I have advised of the point of order. On Saturday 14 December—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I think that I have got the hon. Gentleman's message. Such matters must be raised privately with Madam Speaker.

Fisheries

[Relevant documents: European Community Documents Nos. 9999/96 establishing a Community system for fisheries and aquaculture, 11016/96 on monitoring Community conservation and management measures applicable to third country fishing vessels, 11164/94 relating to guide prices for fishery products in 1997, 11171/96 relating to third country fisheries agreements, and the unnumbered Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 9 December 1996 relating to Community catch possibilities in NAFO waters for 1997, and on 9 December 1996 relating to reciprocal access and 1997 quotas with Norway.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

5.25 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Tony Baldry): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document COM(96)641 relating to the fixing of total allowable catches for 1997 and certain conditions under which they may be fished; and supports the Government's intention to negotiate the best possible fishing opportunities for British fishermen consistent with scientific advice and the need to sustain the stocks for the benefit of future generations of fishermen.

Technically, this is a scrutiny debate on proposals to be discussed and decided at the Fisheries Council of Ministers on Thursday and Friday where, among other things, the total allowable catches of the main stocks of fish will be agreed for the forthcoming year.

I shall refer, first, to the practical difficulties we all have in preparing for this debate. As hon. Members know, the availability of papers for the debate is always difficult. It reflects the pressure of events and the need for the latest scientific advice to be available before the Commission makes its proposals and starts negotiations, not just with the European Union, but with third countries such as Norway. I have taken the matter up with the Fisheries Commissioner and I assure the House that I have done everything humanly possible to ensure that papers are available in as much time as possible. I wrote on 13 December to the Chairman of the Select Committee on European Legislation to provide the very latest information on the outcome of the negotiations with Norway, and copies of the letter were made available in the Vote Office.

By custom, this debate has become an annual opportunity more generally to review the state and prospects of the United Kingdom's fishing industry. It is always right to recall what a hazardous activity fishing can be. In spite of all the technological advances, many fishermen lose their lives at sea as they seek to make their living. In this, the centenary year of the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, we must not forget the realities of the industry.

Undoubtedly, the UK fishing industry faces many challenges. It is a diverse industry, ranging from large refrigerated trawlers fishing in distant waters and spending months at sea, to small coastal trawlers that spend no more than a day away from port. Often it seems that we are beset only by bad news about fishing, but it would be a mistake to underestimate the achievements of UK fishermen and the UK fishing industry or the investment that the industry is making in its own future.

When I visited Peterhead recently, fishermen there made it clear to me that licences—simply the opportunity to catch fish—were being sold for up to £1 million. Recent press reports have commented that the Shetland island of Whalsay alone has at least 20 millionaire fishermen who own the lion's share of the island's £16 million fishing fleet. Just about a week ago, the newest trawler from Whalsay, the 211 ft Zephyr, which is capable of carrying 16,000 tonnes of fish, set out on her maiden voyage. That new boat is estimated to have cost £9 million and it is the latest of seven ships being built for Shetland fishermen. That has been made possible by increased incomes from fishing. Indeed, the value of fish landed in the UK in the first nine months of this year has increased by some 6 per cent. on last year and that increase in value is reflected in improved turnovers at our main fish markets.

I have recently visited fish markets such as Peterhead, Plymouth and Billingsgate, all of which have reported to me substantially increased turnover and increased profits. At Plymouth, for example, sales through the market are expected to have increased from just under £1.5 million in 1994 to nearly £5 million in 1996. In part, that improvement reflects the investment that is being made, often with the help of Government marketing grants. In total, about £63 million has been paid to the industry from public and Community funds in the past three years, with a further £68 million under other EU structural grant measures. Those improvements also reflect, however, increasing consumption and improved value of catches. According to the national food survey published just a few days ago, fish consumption in the UK in the past three years is as high as it has been for more than 20 years. It is important, therefore, to put the UK fishing industry's prospects into proper context.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I am sure that the Minister would concede that fishermen at Peterhead and elsewhere are concerned about the flags of convenience issue. The President of the Board of Trade said that, at the intergovernmental conference, the 48-hour directive was

"the issue that matters to the Government and we intend to insist upon it."—[Official Report, 12 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 163.]

If the Government were to secure agreement on quota hopping—treaty changes to resolve the flags of convenience issue—would they not then agree to the changes, unless and until the 48-hour directive was also agreed? Is it more important to save the fishing industry or to stop working people taking holidays?

Mr. Baldry: One of the reasons I am glad I went to Peterhead is that it reminded me just how much I dislike the Scottish National party. It is so disingenuous; it proclaims that the only future for an independent Scotland is in the European Union, within which it would sign up lock, stock and barrel to the common fisheries policy. I will talk about quota hoppers in some detail, and make clear yesterday's comments by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, who said that it is important that we resolve at the intergovernmental conference the issue both of the 48-hour week and of quota hoppers. If the hon. Gentleman bides his time, he will hear me deal with those issues in terms.

Not all parts or sectors of the UK fishing industry are doing so well. Some ports are under pressure and the industry overall faces substantial challenges, not least the availability of fish to catch.

I know that Fleetwood has experienced a considerable reduction in its fleet, so it is important for it to be able to attract additional throughput of fish. I am sure that my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson), for Wyre (Mr. Mans) and for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett–Bowman) will have shared my pleasure at the grants that I was able to announce recently to aid facilities for packing and processing there, which will, I hope, help sustain activity at Fleetwood.

Dame Elaine Kellett–Bowman (Lancaster): I do not think that my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) is here for the moment, but following the announcement of that grant, morale in Fleetwood has improved.

Mr. Baldry: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's confirmation of that and that Fleetwood is beginning to see that, with our help, there is a clear future for the port.

Equally, there have been massive changes in the port of Grimsby as access to fish stocks has fallen, but there are some positive signs. During the past year, I have been pleased to participate in the opening of the new Grimsby harbour facilities, in the opening of a new fish processing factory and in the launch of a vessel. Those are just some of the signs of investment there and I understand that throughput is rising.

In addition, I have been able to announce a significant number of grants for investment in fish processing and linked facilities in Grimsby, all of which, I hope the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) will in due course acknowledge, is reason for optimism for the fisheries infrastructure in Grimsby. It is now, I think, the leading fish processing centre in the Europe, and it would be justified in taking pride in that.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): My hon. Friend has said that he will refer in detail to quota hopping and, subject to early evening constituency engagements, I look forward to hearing those details in some length, which will, I am sure, assist the House, but will he explain the balance of Government policy on these matters? He referred to investment in modern fishing vessels and the high cost of the technology and equipment. Bearing it in mind that British investors buy other non-British boats, that Spanish investors buy British boats, that Dutch investors buy British, that British buy Dutch, that Dutch buy German, that German buy French, and that investors in Scotland buy English boats in accordance with their rights under the treaty of Rome and the developing single market, is it not wrong for the Government to highlight quota hopping at the expense of other parameters and to give the impression that they want to restrict the market and, indeed, the free enterprise notion of the single market?

Mr. Baldry: I will deal with quota hoppers, but let me deal with my hon. Friend's point. May I say that I will try to deal with every issue. If I have not, I ask hon. Members to intervene. In all fairness, my hon. Friend is mistaken to this extent. He and I and, I think, every hon.

[Mr. Baldry]

Member strongly support the notion of a single market. The UK has done more to promote the single market than any other member state in Europe because we want the EU to be a trading entity. Fishing is the only area of Community activity where there are national quotas, and it makes a lot of sense to ensure that UK fishing quotas can benefit UK fishermen.

Fishing is a hunting activity. Fishing boats are designed to track down and catch as many fish as possible. To ensure sustainable levels of fish for fishermen for years to come, there is always a difficult balance to be struck between enabling the industry to maximise today's catch and ensuring that there are sufficient fish in the sea for years to come. On that issue, Ministers with responsibility for fisheries are inevitably prone to be criticised, both by fishermen for not allowing them to catch as many fish as they should like, and by conservationists for allowing fishermen to catch more fish than they consider to be wise.

In coming to conclusions, we have to have regard to the advice of fisheries scientists, but we also have to give careful attention and consideration to the advice of fishermen themselves as to the strength and sustainability of stocks. After all, it is they who are fishing the waters day by day. They know what they are catching. They know the strength of the stocks and it is their future that is at stake.

In the negotiations at the Fisheries Council this coming Thursday and Friday, my negotiating objectives closely reflect the UK fishing industry's concerns. The House will not be surprised that I have had close and detailed discussions with the UK fishing industry as a whole, stock by stock, on what we shall be seeking to achieve at the forthcoming Council of Ministers meeting. For some key fish stocks, it is proposed that the total allowable catch be increased; for others, the proposal is to maintain the status quo, but there are inevitably some where, on the basis of scientific advice and evidence, it is suggested that, to conserve stocks, catches must be reduced. Where that is so, there is a balance to be struck, taking account of the short-term costs to the industry of quota cuts, and the medium-term benefits that should flow from recovery of stocks.

I pay close attention to the advice of the fishing industry. After all, it is fishermen who gain or lose if the management decisions are wrong. At this week's Council meeting, I shall seek to ensure that the eventual quota for UK fishermen is reasonable and proportionate, having regard to all the facts.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): The Minister of State has described his visits to various ports in England and to Peterhead. I do not know whether he has been to west Scotland recently but, if he has, or if he talks to the Under–Secretary of State for Scotland, he will know the concern about the west Scotland haddock quota. Will the Minister of State press for a substantial increase in that quota? Fishermen should have told him that their view is that the reduction would be detrimental to fishing in west Scotland.

Mr. Baldry: I have not been to west Scotland. I have been to Macduff, whence many fishermen fish off the west of Scotland. They have brought me up to date with the concerns. The hon. Gentleman can rest assured that west Scotland haddock is high on our list of priorities for improvement at the forthcoming Council meeting. I am aware, as is my hon. Friend the Under–Secretary of State for Scotland, of the importance of input on those issues.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): Bearing it in mind that there is no longer any swap between the Dutch allowances and those of the south-west and the North sea, will my hon. Friend say something about area VIIe and Dover sole, and whether there could be increases for west country fishermen in VIIe and no decline for fishermen in VIIf or VIIg?

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend will not be surprised to hear that, when I met representatives of the UK fishing industry to discuss the issue, those from the south-west expressed concern about that particular stock. I made it clear that it is one of our negotiating objectives to improve the situation. We are the main beneficiaries of that stock. We believe that there should be some reasonable improvement on what the Commission has proposed, and I will be trying to achieve that. It is a very valuable stock for the industry in the south-west.

I have no doubt that there will be some tough negotiations in Brussels this coming Thursday and Friday, but my colleagues who have responsibility for fisheries matters in the Scottish Office and the Northern Ireland Office and I are agreed and well focused on the stocks of importance to the United Kingdom in respect of which we want improvement. I am determined that we will achieve substantial improvements on the Commission's proposals.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baldry: I will deal with Northern Ireland in a moment. I promise that I will not miss out anybody. Hon. Members can rest assured that there is not a Member or a port with a fishing interest that will be left out of the debate tonight. I promise hon. Members that it will be like a gazetteer of the United Kingdom.

At this point, perhaps I can assure my hon. Friends the Members for Waveney (Mr. Porter) and for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss) that I have listened carefully to the views of fishermen from Lowestoft and elsewhere along the east coast and that I appreciate their concern about the level of the plaice quota in the North sea. With the prospect of a quota little different from this year, I can say now that I do not envisage carrying out a North sea plaice swap at the Council. That meets the concerns of those who depend on the North sea plaice and ensures an approach consistent with last year. That was fairly acknowledged by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen). Of course, what I will do for the south-west—as I did last year—is seek further international swaps during the year which will be of benefit to it.

One issue that is always difficult—and this may relate to what the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) wants to say—and causes concern at the Council is whether to invoke the Hague preference. When the system of national quotas was established, that convention was introduced, to give the UK and Ireland a prior claim to certain stocks. Until recently, we have been overall beneficiaries of that convention, especially in Scotland. We are now no longer beneficiaries overall.

The immediate difficulty arises when the Republic of Ireland invokes its Hague preference in the Irish sea, largely at the expense of the fishing industry in Northern Ireland. In response to that, I shall want to use international quota swaps to increase our quotas in the Irish sea for the direct benefit of the Northern Irish fishing industry. I shall want, so far as is possible, to mitigate the immediate disadvantages to the Northern Irish industry which result from the Hague preference.

Beyond that, we need to consider whether having the Hague preference is still of benefit to the UK. I have agreed with the UK fishing industry as a whole that the Hague preference is an issue which it would be sensible for us to revisit calmly and in some detail in the new year, involving the whole of the industry. That has been agreed as a sensible way forward by everyone concerned, including the industries in Northern Ireland and Scotland.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I agree with what the Minister said about getting rid of the Hague preference. However, it does not extend to Grimsby. For some reason, the definition of north Britain ends at Flamborough head.

If the Minister is to provide compensation to Northern Ireland for the absence of the Hague preference for its ports and fishermen, the same should apply to the west-coast fisheries that do not benefit from the Hague preference either.

Mr. Baldry: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support of the approach I am taking. However, there is a slight misunderstanding. It is not simply a question of the absence of the Hague preference—Northern Ireland loses fish because the Republic invokes the Hague preference. The areas in the North sea where the hon. Gentleman's fleets fish do not lose fish through the invocation of Hague preference. That is the difference.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am sure that the Minister is aware that Northern Irish fishermen are angry because, under the Hague preference, they are not permitted to take fish out of the water, yet part of their quota can be taken out of the water by the Irish Republic. That is unacceptable to them. They feel that the Hague preference must be renegotiated.

Is the Minister aware that there is an abundance of haddock in the Irish sea? In fact, the scientists in Europe told us at a meeting in Brussels that they did not understand why there was so much haddock. They thought it was so scarce that it should not be fished. The same is true of herring and nephrops. Why cannot the quota for Northern Ireland fishermen be left the same when there is such an abundance of fish in the Irish sea?

Mr. Baldry: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, he will know that I was in Northern Ireland the other day talking to the industry. I fully appreciate its concerns about the invocation of the Hague preference. Of course, it is the Republic of Ireland that invokes it. The representatives of the UK and I have agreed that it is now time to reconsider. Overall, the UK no longer benefits from the Hague preference. Therefore, it must be time to revisit it.

Mr. Salmond rose—

Mr. Baldry: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman once, and I do not intend to do so again. I can anticipate his intervention. The representatives of the Scottish industry who were present at the meeting this morning agreed with our approach. They thought it sensible to revisit the issue of the Hague preference calmly and coolly in the new year.

Mr. Salmond: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be misleading the House for a Minister to suggest that he has the agreement of an industry, when in fact all he did was tell its representatives what he was going to do?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): That is not something for the Chair to judge.

Mr. Baldry: I agree, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I had a meeting with representatives of the industry, at which they had every opportunity to express concerns about the approach that I intend to take. They made it clear to me that they saw that approach as sensible. They agreed that we should revisit the issue of the Hague preference calmly and sensibly in the new year.

I want to deal with a point raised by the hon. Member for North Antrim—the question of haddock. As we all know, the Republic of Ireland tends, for a number of reasons, to talk down stocks in the Irish sea. My approach will be based on best science, having regard to what is sensible for and in the best interests of the Northern Ireland fishing industry. We need to ensure that the quotas available for the Northern Irish industry are based on best science and what is in the industry's interests, not on the interests of any other member of the Community. That will be my approach, and I hope that hon. Members agree that it is a sensible way forward.

I make it quite clear to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who is mischief making, that I want to take the matter forward, calmly and collectively, as a UK industry issue, because different parts of the UK have different approaches to the issue, but it is important that they are all involved and that the matter is discussed calmly and coolly.

During the debate last year, there was much comment on the subject of quota hoppers. I think that, by now, everyone is aware of the nature of quota hoppers. The national quotas allocated under the common fisheries policy are intended to provide for the fishermen and fishing communities of member states. Quota hoppers use UK national quotas, yet they are essentially foreign owned, foreign skippered, foreign crewed vessels that never land their catch in the UK and bring no economic benefit to the UK—but in the eyes of the law they are UK fishing boats. It is clearly a crazy situation. Thanks to the persistence of my hon. Friends from the south-west, especially my hon. Friends the Members for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe), for South–East Cornwall (Sir R. Hicks), for South Hams and for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), we have all focused on the need to ensure that it cannot be permitted to continue. That is why the Government have tabled treaty changes at the forthcoming intergovernmental conference.

We are seeking enabling powers that would allow us to insist on there being real economic links between vessels that fish our quotas and the coastal communities that depend on them. We want to be able to introduce, as necessary, requirements on national ownership, residency, crewing, port of operation and landings without the risk of successful challenge before the European Court.

I want to ensure that the UK fish quota is available for the benefit of UK fishermen. Everyone now realises that the issue of quota hoppers will not go away, that it has to be resolved, and that we must ensure that the fish that go with the UK's fish quotas are available for UK fishermen. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear at Dublin, the resolution of that issue is a key priority.

Yesterday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary stated:

"For example, we believe the social chapter should not be introduced by the back door—that is something on which the Prime Minister has made our position very clear; we have to look out for the interests of our fishing communities who have been gravely damaged by the way in which the quota-hopping phenomena have been distorted very much to our disadvantage. These are two clear examples which are fundamental to our objectives in the negotiation . . . We have made it very, very clear. At the end of the day, the intergovernmental conference reaches a successful conclusion when all the member states are content with the outcome. We have indicated we will not be satisfied with an outcome that does not address for example the two points that I have just raised."

I know that the fishing industry knows that we are determined to take effective action on quota hoppers. That is what we intend to do.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend, because his comments are most reassuring. They are particularly reassuring after the Prime Minister's clear statement, today, that, in June, in Amsterdam, he would—in the hopeful event of another Conservative Government—veto a revised treaty if a quota-hopping amendment were not incorporated into it.

Will my hon. Friend clarify one point? The Government's proposed draft protocol to deal with the quota hopping problem was not included in the draft produced by the Irish at Dublin. That proposal, with other proposals from other nations, slipped into the appendix. Is he hopeful that, between now and Amsterdam, that proposal will be incorporated into a revised treaty, as the Government hope and expect?

Mr. Baldry: Absolutely; and I think that no one can be in any doubt that everyone in Europe realises that quota hopping is a problem that must be resolved. When the Spanish Prime Minister recently visited Britain to meet my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, it could not have been lost on anyone—least of all on anyone in Spain—that much of the questioning by journalists was not on long-standing bilateral issues between the United Kingdom and Spain, such as Gibraltar, but on the issue of quota hopping. It is not an issue that will go away, and our colleagues in Europe understand that.

The Prime Minister made it very clear at Dublin that the problem of quota hopping will not disappear and that it must be resolved. Furthermore, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary could not have made any clearer our commitment to resolving the issue than he did yesterday, when he said that we will not be satisfied with an outcome of the intergovernmental conference that does not address that issue. It is quite clear that the fishing industry understands our commitment to resolving the issue.

In the mean time, I am determined to ensure that all fishing vessels in the UK abide by the rules, irrespective of ownership or of place of landing. Earlier today, in response to a written question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), I provided a list of all the prosecutions taken by the Ministry this year that resulted in fines of £5,000 or more. Many of those prosecutions concerned foreign vessels. Of those concerning UK vessels, more than half involved quota hoppers. That fact concerns me, and I am sure that it concerns the House. I shall be investigating what can be done to strengthen compliance with the law.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baldry: Have I given way already to the hon. Gentleman? Yes, I have.

Quota hoppers currently comprise about 20 per cent. of our offshore fleet. I made it clear that we do not intend to contemplate any further compulsory decommissioning or reduction in the UK fishing effort until the entire matter of quota hoppers is satisfactorily resolved.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): My hon. Friend should know that the stand he has taken over the past year—specifically on quota hopping, but also on many other fishing issues—has been greatly appreciated in the south-west. Does he agree that that issue—as valuable as his comments on quota hopping are—is merely an aspect of a far wider problem: the common fisheries policy? In turn, that policy throws into question the entire basis on which we participate in Europe. Does he look forward to a time when the basis on which we conduct our fishing policy is much more in tune with a sensible way in which to do things than with operating a policy that requires him to apply a type of aggressive sticking plaster to deal with problems in a very narrow manner? That action is very worth while, but it is based on a policy that does not work.

Mr. Baldry: I shall deal at some length with the type of reforms that I should like to be made to the fisheries policy, but I should tell my hon. Friend and the House that we would be misleading ourselves if we believed that simply exiting the common fisheries policy would resolve all our problems, because we would still have to negotiate bilateral arrangements with our fellow member states. In recent weeks, for example, many of us have been preoccupied by the dispute between Guernsey and France. Guernsey is not a member of the European Union or of the common fisheries policy, but that does not stop it disputing with France access to waters. That dispute must be resolved bilaterally.

Much of my time is spent attempting to resolve disputes within the UK fishing fleet, which may be between conflicting interests. I shall say more in a moment about the conflict—which my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge will know only too well—in south Devon between trawlermen and crabbers. As he also knows, in the south-west there are occasionally quite serious disputes between the English fleet and the Scottish fleet.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Baldry: No; I should like to deal with one or two questions at a time.

The idea that simply exiting the common fisheries policy would resolve all our problems is mistaken. However, of course we require substantial reform of the common fisheries policy, and I shall deal with that issue in some detail.

Mr. Mans: Does my hon. Friend agree that bilateral negotiations do not all always work to our advantage, as we saw in the dispute with Iceland? Many years ago, the Iceland Government offered us 64,000 pounds of cod, which was turned down by the then Labour Government, who wanted twice that amount. Ultimately, however, we received nothing at all. That was one of the reasons why the fishing fleet at Fleetwood declined so severely.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend has made an extremely good point. It would be fair to say that part of the challenge and part of the difficulties currently faced by the UK fishing industry are a consequence of the long-term loss of our distant waters. Negotiations on those distant waters were bilateral.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland) rose—

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) made a fatuous point at the start of this debate.

Mr. Wallace indicated dissent.

Mr. Baldry: I shall deal in a moment with the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) about coastal waters.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baldry: No, I will not.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister is frit.

Mr. Baldry: No, I am not. The hon. Gentleman's jumping up and down like a schoolboy will not cause me to give way to him. He made a fatuous point at the beginning of this debate. If he wishes to, he can make his own points in his own manner in his own time.

The UK industry has other concerns. Many of my hon. Friends have understandable concerns that the six and 12-mile fishery limits, which restrict access by foreign vessels to waters around the British coast, will form part of the review in 2002. That matter has been a concern particularly for my hon. Friends the Members for Ludlow (Mr. Gill)—who has visited many ports this year—and for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body). We have made it clear that, for us, the six and 12-mile limits are, and will remain, non-negotiable, and that any interference with those limits is unacceptable.

The restrictions on access by foreign fishing vessels within our six and 12-mile limits are an essential derogation from the equal access provisions under the common fisheries policy. We insisted on them when we joined the Community; they were extended unanimously in 1983 and 1992; and we intend to get a definitive establishment of these restrictions as a part of the CFP at the earliest possible opportunity.

I intend that, as soon as possible, we shall seek to secure the agreement of all member states that there will be no relaxation of, and no change to, the six and 12-mile fishery limits in 2002 and that the six and 12-mile limits should be considered permanent features of the CFP.

Going around the fishing ports of the UK, I have detected a considerable sense of alienation among members of the fishing industry at the way in which fishing policy generally emerges. I am convinced that fishermen must have more say in fishing policy. It is for that reason that I have not only sought to have as many meetings as possible with representatives of the fishing industry, but I have ensured that they have much greater contact with fisheries scientists.

Much more needs to be done, however. That is why I have suggested to European colleagues that there needs to be a pattern of regional committees to take forward good fisheries management. That would mean that member states which have fishing quota in particular waters should come together on a regular basis, whether at ministerial or official level. Most important, they must involve their respective fishing industries and fishermen to discuss how those waters can best be managed in the short and long-term interests of fishermen.

I want fishermen to be fully involved with the development and management of the common fisheries policy. We are making our contribution, which is why much closer contacts have been developed over the past year, including ministerial contacts with fishermen. I and the other UK fisheries Ministers have had numerous meetings with fishermen around the coast in order to hear their views first hand and to explain Government policy.

In addition, there have been numerous meetings between the industry and the Government's fisheries scientists to improve fishermen's understanding of the science underlying fisheries management and to give them the opportunity to make their own contribution. We need to do more, and it should be done by creating regional committees of fishermen and officials from different member states to study developments and to feed in advice before decisions are taken. I am glad to say that, at our request, the European Commission has agreed that such a pilot committee should be established. That is good news.

For the longer term, I should want to see what powers could be devolved to such committees based on the perfectly commonsense principles of subsidiarity and decisions being best taken where they are most relevant. I believe that by involving the fishing industry much more in its own future, fisheries management overall will improve considerably.

Our fishing industry has been at the forefront of making suggestions for technical conservation measures to conserve fish stocks and to make fishing more selective and reduce discards. We also have to tackle industrial fishing which is why, at the forthcoming Fisheries Council, we are arguing for a limit be to placed on the number of sand-eels that can be caught.

The UK took the initiative on conservation measures in setting up a fisheries conservation group, bringing together fishermen, fisheries scientists and administrators. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland wants to make my speech for me, he is very welcome to do so. In the spirit of Christmas, and to put the hon. Gentleman out of his pain, I happily give way to him.

Mr. Wallace: The tactic worked. The Minister said earlier that there was some link between the Government's policy on quota hopping and resistance to any compulsory further reduction in the UK fleet. Will he clarify precisely what the policy is? In June this year he was talking about trying to assemble a minority block to stop the proposals for multi-annual guidance programme—MAGP—IV but, in October, the Prime Minister talked about not implementing further compulsory cuts. Clearly, a measure could be agreed with Britain opting out, but what is the Minister's position—not to implement or to try to assemble a blocking minority?

Mr. Baldry: We made it clear that we do not intend to contemplate any further reductions in either the UK fishing capacity or effort control until the issue of quota hoppers is resolved.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Answer the question.

Mr. Baldry: I am going to answer the question. We have to bear it in mind that the Council of Ministers has made little, if any, progress with MAGP IV. The Commission's proposals were roundly condemned by all members of the Council of Ministers. Working hard, the presidency proposed a compromise that commanded the support only of Ireland—that is not surprising as Ireland had the presidency—and Luxembourg. No progress was made at the last Council of Ministers meeting. It was agreed to adjourn the matter with a view to further discussions by officials. I understand that there have been two meetings at official level, but they sought merely to restate some basic principles on which many of them were not even agreed. The latest meeting of the Committee of Permanent Representatives, or COREPER, discussed what would happen if there was no decision on MAGP IV before the end of this year.

As I told representatives of the UK fishing industry, the possibilities are almost endless, and a number of hypothetical situations could arise. The industry and the House may rest assured that, whatever situation arises, we shall fulfil the commitment I made that we shall not be implementing any further reduction in capacity or effort control until the issue of quota hoppers is resolved. However, it is impossible to say exactly what shape that will take as no one can tell when, if or how the Community will come to a decision on MAGP IV.

The United Kingdom took the initiative on conservation measures by setting up a fisheries conservation group. The results of the group's work provided a strong starting point for the UK's contribution to Community discussions on technical conservation. We are now pressing the Community to ensure that fishing gear and practices are managed according to rules that are fair to all, which reduce the catch of unwanted small fish and so help reduce discards and enable stocks to recover.

Disappointingly, the Commission has not taken on board as many of our and the UK industry's suggestions as I should have hoped. In large part, that is because it clearly feels the need to find technical conservation measures which can apply to all Community waters. Of course, these are extremely difficult to find, and again demonstrate the need for sensible regional management. Different waters doubtless require different conservation measures. For conservation measures to be successful, they need to command the support of the industry; and to command its support, we need the involvement of the fishing industry. The UK fishing industry and the Government are very largely at one in our concerns about the Commission proposals on technical conservation, and I shall continue to argue those concerns in detail whenever the need arises.

There is also understandable concern in the fishing industry, particularly among owners of smaller vessels, about the amount of regulation with which they have to cope. I feel strongly that the position of smaller vessels needs to be protected in the interests of deregulation. Vessels under 10 m in length already have a much lighter administrative regime and do not have to complete logbooks. Data on the catches of these vessels are collected in a non-bureaucratic way. Vessels under 18 m in length are exempt from the reporting provisions for western waters, and I shall want smaller vessels to be exempt from the requirements of any satellite monitoring.

More generally, I shall try to ensure that we keep to the absolute minimum the regulatory burden on fishermen. That is something for which we must continue to press. I am grateful to my hon Friends the Members for Basildon (Mr. Amess) and for Castle Point for bringing home to Commissioner Bonino during their recent visit to Brussels the special needs of inshore fishermen.

In recent months, many hon. Members have spoken to me about their concerns for the long-term future of the industry. The very practical problems faced by some fishermen are well illustrated by those in Start bay. My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams approached me about the problems of conflicting interests there. If there are conflicts locally, I hope that they can be resolved locally. If the Devon sea fisheries committee proposes a byelaw, I shall want to be satisfied that it is proportionate and does not simply seek to advance the interests of any one group.

My hon. Friend has also rightly drawn my attention to the concerns about membership of sea fisheries committees. These have an important role in the local management of inshore fisheries, a role which has expanded with their limits being extended from 3 to 6 miles, and with increasing environmental interest. I assure the House that, when new appointments are made to these committees next year, I shall be careful to take account of this changed situation.

With one of the largest fishing fleets in his constituency for a decade or more, my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams, like other hon. Members from the south-west, has impressed on the Government the problems facing the industry and suggested how they might best be tackled. Not surprisingly, his help has paid dividends, with the Brixham trawlermen landing a larger and more valuable catch in the past couple of years and the shell fishermen on the coastline also benefiting. All the hon. Members with whom I have had meetings on the subject are tireless workers for the industry and for individual fishermen.

Mr. Steen: In return, may I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the help and support that he has given to my local industry? The fishermen in Brixham and the shell fishermen have been immensely supported and rewarded by his constant attention to their problems. I pay a personal tribute to his support for the industry.

Mr. Baldry: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that comment. All hon. Members, across parties, are concerned to secure the best interests of the United Kingdom fishing industry—in Newlyn, in Brixham, in the Thames estuary, in Skegness, in Northern Ireland or in Scotland.

Another example of local concerns was provided this summer by my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, North and for Wyre, who went to considerable lengths to explain the problems facing Fleetwood and the efforts that all those involved were making to restore the fortunes of that key port. I have been greatly impressed by how the industry throughout the United Kingdom is looking ahead and planning for the future. I wish that it were within my gift to convert two fish to 5,000. I have repeatedly made it clear that I am prepared to listen to the industry and to consider how the management of our quotas might be improved. We are now considering proposals from the industry for long-term changes to the quota management system. Of course all fishermen want to catch more.

I know that fishermen in the south-east have experienced major problems as quotas have diminished and have come under pressure from quota hoppers. Many colleagues have pressed for action to assist the non-sector. Concern comes from many parts of the coast and has been voiced by my hon. Friends the Members for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) and for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait), among others. We have taken account, and will continue to take account, of the needs of the non-sector. We have introduced underpinning for the quota allocations made to the under-10 m fleet and to the non-sector. Next year, that is to be extended to the non-sector allocations for North sea plaice, whiting, channel cod and sole. Despite all the difficulties facing us, we have managed to keep open our main inshore fisheries to the under-10 m fleet to the end of this year.

Dr. Spink: My hon. Friend is doing a sterling job on behalf of our fishermen. The under-10 m fleet brings in less than 2 per cent. of this country's white fish take, but it accounts for the majority of boats on the sea. Will my hon. Friend consider removing those boats entirely from regulation? That seems the right way to manage sea fish conservation and the fishing industry. Commissioner Bonino has undertaken to consider the legislative and financial implications. Will my hon. Friend bring the suggestion forward on every possible occasion?

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend knows from my visits to Leigh-on-Sea—I have also visited other ports in the Thames estuary and Rye—that I have taken on board the concerns of the non-sector. We have to consider how the non-sector can avoid being squeezed out. Many people earn their living from the non-sector, often in small boats and in difficult circumstances, subjected to the vagaries of the weather. I hope that I have made it clear to those in the non-sector that I fully appreciate their concerns.

I think that there is no disagreement in the House on the fact that the common fisheries policy is not working as it was intended and needs to be reformed. It is over-bureaucratic, it has failed to protect fish stocks sustainably, it is open to abuse and, above all, it is not fair to British fishermen. We are determined to change all that. We have made it clear to the industry how we intend to do that and are taking the issue forward to ensure that the common fisheries policy is, as far as possible, of real benefit to United Kingdom fishermen. We shall shortly issue a response to the report of the CFP review group. We are signalling the key elements that we are aiming for now and in preparation for the 2002 review.

We have made it clear that we totally reject any idea of a single European fishing fleet, managed and policed from Brussels. There are regular suggestions in the media that plans exist to create such a fleet. The present rules of the common fisheries policy place responsibility for managing quotas and vessels on member states. It is also a national responsibility to enforce fisheries regulations in national waters out to 200 miles. We shall reject any proposals that those national responsibilities should be taken away and that there should in any way be a single community fleet, managed and policed from Brussels.

I believe that the fishing industry recognises that much has been achieved this year. The industry and the Government agree on what remains to be done. I recognise that the practical politics of life are such that opposition parties feel it necessary to try to create divisions on the issue. That is a pity, because it would be in the best interests of the fishing industry throughout the UK if the House were, for once, able to send out a united and unanimous endorsement to Europe and elsewhere of what we are seeking to achieve for our fishing industry.

I am determined that the UK fishing industry should have a clear future and a strong future as we go into the 21st century. The fishermen of Britain can be confident that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, my fellow fisheries Ministers and I—indeed, the whole Government—are determined to do all that is necessary to secure the industry's future.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"believes that the failure of this Government in its seventeen years of office to tackle the problems facing the fishing industry is an unacceptable threat to the future of fishing communities in England, Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland; regrets the failure of the United Kingdom Government to implement a decommissioning policy until 1993; recognises that fishing by non-UK vessels against UK quotas is unacceptable to our fishing industry and calls for effective action to tackle quota-hopping; regrets the Government's failure to prevent increased Spanish access to the Irish Box and Western Waters from 1 January 1996; concludes that the United Kingdom Government has not represented effectively in Europe the interests of this country's fishing industry; further recognises that the overriding priority for the Common Fisheries Policy must be the conservation of fish stocks, without which the fishing industry cannot survive; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to work in Europe to achieve reforms of the Common Fisheries Policy that ensure the conservation and fair allocation of fish stocks with effective enforcement by all European States".

As the Minister said, this is the major annual fisheries debate. It is an opportunity for the House to pass judgment on the Government's handling of fisheries policy and their treatment of our fishing communities during the year. As usual, it is taking place before the main Fisheries Council meeting at Christmas, rightly giving hon. Members a chance to express their views on the proposals—not least those on total allowable catches and quotas—that will come up before the Council later this week.

I should like to raise several points about the Fisheries Council. My hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) will deal with more issues when he winds up. There are important questions on quotas to be dealt with and it is understandable that hon. Members on both sides should raise detailed points when local fishermen are worried about the effects on them of the proposals.

There is also concern about the effect on Northern Ireland of the Hague preference. We must address that. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor), who said that he had received a letter from the Government about that. It is right to mention that.

There is no question but that the Northern Ireland fishing communities have had a raw deal compared with those in the Irish Republic under the common fisheries policy. That is indisputable, considering how the amount of fish landed in the different fishing ports has changed from the traditional patterns since implementation of the CFP. However, any alterations made to the arrangements in an attempt to protect and help the fishermen of Northern Ireland—clearly, we strongly support that aim—must not damage other fishing communities in the United Kingdom. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members from Northern Ireland agree.

When the Minister states, as he has to, that the issue will be resolved through international quota swapping, we must ask questions. Presumably, the Republic of Ireland will not give up quota without something in return from the United Kingdom, although the swap may be more complicated than that. We simply put down a marker that any quota swap must be handled with caution because if a quota swap was to the disadvantage of fishing communities in, for example, the south-west of England, that would be a matter of legitimate concern for both sides of the House.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): I welcome the Opposition spokesman's recognition that the Hague preference is a major problem for the County Down fishing industry. This year alone, the current proposals for the United Kingdom—and that is mainly Northern Ireland in this context—under the Hague preference will mean a loss of 800 tonnes of cod, 1,000 tonnes of whiting and 300 tonnes of plaice. We in Northern Ireland want to hear not only what the Government intend to do about this, but what the Opposition would do to tackle the problem.

Dr. Strang: I will certainly come to that point. I am very conscious of some of the other concerns that Northern Ireland fishermen, along with other UK fishermen, have in relation to Government policy.

I accept what the right hon. Member for Strangford says and we are grateful for the information he has given the House. There is no question but that the invocation of the Hague preference by the Republic of Ireland is unacceptable in terms of its impact on the fishing communities in Northern Ireland.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Republic, although it claims its preference, does not always fish it? We then lose out completely. Northern Ireland is not losing out because of arrangements with other fishing fleets round the United Kingdom coast. The argument is with Dublin and with the Hague preference, and it must be faced. The fishermen of Northern Ireland do not want a revision of the preference. They want that part of the Hague preference to be taken away completely so that no Government can say, "We are taking your fish and even though we do not fish them all, you are getting none of them."

Dr. Strang: Again, the House is grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention. As he says, the Republic of Ireland seems to have got such a generous quota that its fishermen have not, on many occasions, been able to fish up to the quota. That is what I meant when I said that Northern Ireland fishermen had got a raw deal from the implementation of the policy compared with fishermen in the Republic. I point out to the House that my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe has visited the issue before; this is not a matter in which we have suddenly taken an interest. We recognise that the problem must be addressed.

I come now to a matter which concerns fishermen throughout the United Kingdom, including Northern Ireland. The debate is not just about total allowable catches, quotas and the Hague preference, which are important, but about multi-annual guidance programme IV. It is also about the cuts that will be imposed on our fishing fleet. The reality is that there are many communities—I include the fishing communities of Northern Ireland—where decommissioning is not a panacea and is not acceptable because it means selling jobs and the livelihood of future generations of fishermen.

The Minister's reply to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) was inadequate because he raised an important point. The Government have said that they will not implement multi-annual guidance programme IV, whatever is agreed, until the issue of quota hopping is sorted out. We support that point. That should mean that the Government will continue to block any agreement on the multi-annual guidance programme along the lines being advocated by the Commission or the presidency. That is an extremely important point.

Surely to goodness even this Government, whose record on the matter has been disastrous as I shall explain later, will manage to sustain a blocking minority to prevent any agreement on cuts in our fleet, not just at the next Fisheries Council meeting, but at subsequent meetings until we have got past the intergovernmental conference and until we have resolved the problem of quota hopping.

Mr. Baldry: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman listened to what I said in my very full answer to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). I did not use the word "implement". I said that we were not prepared to contemplate any further reduction in UK fishing capacity or fishing effort until matters were resolved in the IGC.

The hon. Gentleman asked about frustrating the Commission and the presidency and about preventing them from bringing forward proposals. We are, of course, making it clear to our colleagues where we find that the proposals have major shortcomings. No decision has yet been taken and it is unlikely that any decision will be taken this coming week. It is very unlikely that any decision will be taken in the foreseeable future.

All sorts of things may arise because many member states are concerned about the structural funds that go with multi-annual guidance programmes III and IV. They are concerned about whether it may be in the interests of everyone to have a roll-over of MAGP III for a further year. The hon. Gentleman can rest assured that whatever may arise, I will protect the UK fishing industry and ensure that we continue with our basic premise—that there will be no further reduction in UK fishing capacity or fishing effort until the whole issue of quota hoppers is resolved. I hope that that is perfectly clear.

Dr. Strang: We have heard the word "contemplate" too often over the years. If the Minister is saying that the Government will block the cuts in our fleet—which will mean cuts in the fleets of other member states—that is fine. However, my simple point is this. Blocking agreement will be a success, but coming back here in January—I gather from what the Minister has said that there is no danger of this—and saying that other Governments have agreed to multi-annual guidance programme IV, but that the British Government are not contemplating it will be a very different state of affairs. From what the Minister has said, I trust that we need not worry about that possibility.

Mr. Steen: Nobody doubts the hon. Gentleman's sincerity. I listened, however, to the Minister's speech which was a tour de force. Does the hon. Gentleman really disagree with specific points or are the Opposition just shadow boxing around various issues? I do not understand so far whether the Opposition really disagree with the Government's policy. If they do not disagree and think that the Government are doing a jolly good job, why are they opposing the Government tonight?

Dr. Strang: This is all very fine, but we cannot just ignore the Government's record. Conservative Members staged a most impressive love-in during the debate; we shall see whether that is sustained during the vote. As I said at the beginning, this is not just a debate about what will be discussed in the Fisheries Council; this is the major annual fisheries debate of the year. The hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) can rest assured that I will come to some of our differences.

There is a serious point which all hon. Members know in their heart of hearts is an extremely important one. The truth is that the decisions in which the Minister will be participating this week will be taken against the background of, I hope, a recognition that we need more effective conservation measures for the stocks that are at risk. There is a legitimate and real concern about what is likely to happen to the fish stocks on which, among others, our fishermen are dependent if effective conservation is not implemented.

I had the pleasure of attending an interesting meeting at the House of Commons organised by the parliamentary and scientific committee; one or two other hon. Members were also there. I heard Professor John Beddington of Imperial college and Mr. Barry Deas, the chief executive of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations, give a splendid presentation on the issue. The professor was able to be a bit more detached, but his speech was powerful. Mr. Barry Deas was in some ways more impressive because his first requirement is to meet the daily concerns and needs of fishermen who have to earn a living. Anyone who attended the meeting and anyone who follows these issues knows perfectly well that there is a real issue here which the House of Commons will surely not pretend does not exist.

Mr. Mans: In the light of what he has said, will the hon. Gentleman state how his party will preserve jobs in the fishing industry in the short term while providing stocks of fish in the long term? Bearing that in mind, he did not answer the point raised by the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) in respect of the Hague preference and the Irish Republic. Will he address that point and say what his party would do about it?

Dr. Strang: I am sorry, but that will not wash. I answered both hon. Gentlemen on the issue of Northern Ireland. However, I shall return to the important point that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

To illustrate that there is some common ground, we should recall that in the summer the Minister of State advised the House that nearly 60 per cent. of the main stocks in the waters that we fish are at risk of biological collapse. Last month, the Advisory Committee on Fishery Management of the International Council for the Exploration of the Seas warned that many EU fish stocks are outside safe biological spawning levels while fishing mortality rates are at historically high levels.

As the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology concluded in its excellent report, if action is not taken to conserve fish stocks, it will be too late to prevent total collapses in stocks, as has occurred in the American Georges bank, the Black sea and off the Canadian Grand Banks.

Let me turn to another point that must concern Members on both sides of the House. There is a worrying and growing discrepancy between the total allowable catches that are agreed every year—no doubt they will be agreed again this week in Brussels—and what is actually landed by our fishermen. As hon. Members have acknowledged—I am grateful to the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) who represents an important fishing community—throughout the European Union substantial volumes of fish are being landed outwith the quotas. That is a measure of the failure of both Government policy and the common fisheries policy.

One reason for black fish landings is that fishermen sense that the total allowable catches—and the data on which the TACs are based—takes far too little account of either the fishermen's own experience of current stock levels or the socio-economic effects of wild quota fluctuations. That results in the vicious circle whereby under-reporting by fishermen further jeopardises the accuracy of the catch predictions on which the TAC should be based. Once again this year the ACFM has stated that misreporting had severely hampered its efforts to assess roundfish stocks in the west of Scotland. Conservative Members need to understand a simple point: if stocks are under pressure, there can be no justification for allowing the additional access of vessels from other member states to exploit those stocks. That is precisely what happened at the beginning of the year in the Irish box and the western waters.

Two Christmases ago, all the Government had to do to construct a blocking minority was to achieve the support of one large country and one small country. Yet even on an issue as clear cut as the over-exploitation of fish stocks in the waters off the south-west of England, they were unable to achieve that blocking minority. If I have pressed the Minister hard on the threatened cuts to our fleet under the multi-annual guidance programme IV, it is because of our experience on that occasion.

Dr. Spink: Will the hon. Member give way?

Dr. Strang: No, I cannot give way all the time. It is important not only that we use our veto when we have to, but that we construct and maintain a blocking minority and even sometimes achieve a qualified majority. That is how we have to engage in the European Union. There is no easy solution.

The common fisheries policy is fundamentally flawed. There is a conflict between the implementation of the principle of equal access of member states to the different fisheries within the jurisdiction of the EU and the conservation of fish stocks. Equal access to fish in all the waters of all member states is a concept that stems from the treaty principles of non-discrimination among member states.

Right hon. and hon. Members who have concluded that the United Kingdom should withdraw from the CFP are entitled to that view, but it is not the position of the Labour party. We believe that it is in the interests of the fishing industry that we stay at the European Union negotiating table.

I am pleased to see the Secretary of State for Scotland in his place this afternoon. He opened last year's debate and no one could have described the position better. I remind the House of his words:

> "Renegotiating the treaty to exclude fisheries from the scope of Community competence would be a monumental and probably impossible task. It would require unanimity and ratification by all member states and that could be bought only at a huge price."—[Official Report, 19 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1353-54.]

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. He criticised the principle of equal access to the common resource; however he seemed to imply that nothing would persuade him and his party to leave the common fisheries policy. Does he not realise that the principle of equal access to the common resource is the fundamental policy of the common fisheries policy and he cannot have it both ways?

Dr. Strang: I am not attempting to have it both ways any more than the Secretary of State for Scotland did when he spoke in last year's debate. There is common ground between the Government and the official Opposition and indeed the other parties in the House of Commons that withdrawal from the common fisheries policy is not a practical option. I respect the opinion of some Conservative Members who want Britain to withdraw from the European Union. That is a perfectly respectable and arguable position, but the Labour party has no sympathy with that view.

The Labour party believes that the common fisheries policy is in need of radical reform. That is why we set out our commitment to CFP reform in "New Labour, New Life for Britain"—a document that has been endorsed at every level of the Labour party and that will be the basis for the manifesto that we will put to the people of Britain.

A Labour Government will attach a high priority to fisheries policy and to securing a reformed CFP. [Interruption.] The Minister would do well to read some of the debates on the CFP that took place before he took over the job. He should read our recommendations. We welcome his proposal for more regional control and more localised fisheries management. It is clear from the expression on his face that the hon. Member for St. Ives remembers that. I recall advocating that. I also remember the then Agriculture Minister, now the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, attempting to rubbish that position. He did not succeed in that and I was pleased when that and some of our more important ideas were put forward in the report of the Common Fisheries Policy Review Group—the Goodlad report—which is an excellent document.

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman says that there is no quarrel with us over the fundamentals of the CFP. If he agrees with us on regional management and the other ideas that I put forward, why on earth is he voting against us tonight? That will only send a confused signal to others in Europe. He should join us in the Division Lobby tonight.

Dr. Strang: I can assure the Minister that we consider that the Government's record on fisheries has been a disaster and that they have been utterly ineffective in their ability to represent the fishing industry in the European Union.

Mr. John D. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman said that the Labour party would push for the reform of the current common fisheries policy. Can we return to the original question of the Hague preference? The hon. Gentleman agreed with me that it was damaging to the fishing industry in Northern Ireland and, contrary to what may have been implied earlier in the debate, it has been damaging to the United Kingdom fishing industry not just recently, but for the past five years. Therefore, will the hon. Gentleman consider it not on a regional basis, but on a United Kingdom basis and let us know what the Labour party would do? Would they work to abolish the Hague preference?

Dr. Strang: With regard to the Hague preference, the Minister of State said today that he had all the fishermen's organisations—[Interruption.] I will answer the right hon. Member for Strangford in the way that hon. Members would expect of me.

Yes, we recognise the problem. Yes, we want action to be taken. When the Minister says that that will be achieved by international quota swapping—that is the phrase, I believe, but he will correct me if I am wrong—that is fine. But I must say honestly and fairly to the right hon. Member for Strangford—who, I am sure, would not expect anything else—that we cannot give the Government a blank cheque to wreak whatever damage they want on the fishermen on the south-west of England by taking away their quotas; obviously not. [Interruption.] The Minister of State understands the point, although the Under–Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) may not.

As hon. Members who follow such matters know, it is naive to think that there is a load of fish that we can be given for nothing by other member states of the European Union to solve the problem. We hope that the Minister of State will solve it, and that he will do so in a way that will not lead to his hon. Friends who represent constituencies in the south-west of England to denounce him in January or February. The problem can be solved, but it must be done sensibly.

We should recognise that this is an extremely important fisheries debate. It is not just about the minor points raised by Conservative Members. Of course, I do not refer to the Northern Ireland issue as a minor issue, nor is the multi-annual guidance programme IV a minor issue. The Government Front Bench should take the matter more seriously, or they may come to regret it.

I referred to the Goodlad report, which is an excellent document. I thought that the Minister of State might have dwelt more on it, but perhaps the Minister who winds up will develop it further. The report contains many excellent proposals for the short and medium term, and important proposals for the longer term. If a Labour Government were elected to office, they would want to take up many of the recommendations in the report.

The Government cannot escape their record on fisheries policy: 17 years of failure. Part of the problem is that when a difficulty arises, the Government play it down or ignore it entirely. I was a little disappointed in the Minister's reference to the Guernsey fishermen's problem, which he portrayed as a problem between Guernsey and France. I trust that he is not suggesting that the United Kingdom will wash its hands of an issue that is taking place in British waters.

The Government's policy should be a source of embarrassment to Ministers. It is a pattern of foolish and unfair decisions, often reversed in the face of protest by the fishing industry, the Opposition and Conservative Back-Bench Members, who argue the case for their fishing communities. Right hon. and hon. Members will remember the unfair and unworkable compulsory tie-up regime, which led to the demeaning spectacle of our National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations having to take the British Government to the European Court.

The hon. Member for St. Ives agreed at the time that the Government had deprived the industry of a decommissioning scheme for many years. Decommissioning is not a panacea, and it is unacceptable that our vessels should be decommissioned in order to give greater opportunities to vessels from other member states of the EU to fish in UK waters or waters within the jurisdiction of the EU.

I reminded the House of the Government's disastrous failure to keep the additional Spanish vessels out of the Irish box and the western waters two years ago. That came into force this year. [Interruption.] The Government could not even muster a blocking minority on that issue.

I am pleased that the Government are now addressing the issue of quota hopping. In the case of some high-value species, such as sole, hake and plaice, 40 per cent. of our national quota is affected. Across the national quota as a whole, the figure is about 20 per cent. That is huge—it is disastrous. The problem has not suddenly arisen in the past few months. The Government were in office when the common fisheries policy had its 10-year review and when the new CFP regulation was negotiated. Indeed, the Government held the presidency of the Council of Ministers at the end of 1992, when the new regulation was agreed.

Mr. Nicholls rose—

Dr. Strang: No, I will not give way. The Government knew full well that quota hopping was an issue then—the Factortame judgment was in 1991—but they made no serious attempt to resolve the problem. Statements made by Government and fisheries Departments on their negotiating list show no trace of any move to solve the problem. In the statement made by the then Minister—the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer)—on the conclusion of the negotiations, there is no mention of any moves to resolve the problem of quota hopping.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Strang: The Government are now talking tough on quota hopping. We welcome that. When the matter was raised at Agriculture Question Time, the Minister indicated that he was on the verge of resolving the matter.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Strang: I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Strang: I repeat: I am not giving way.

Mr. Nicholls rose—

Dr. Strang: Again, I am not giving way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) says that he is not giving way, the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) should listen and resume his seat. [Interruption.] Order. I do not need a comment.

Dr. Strang: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Prime Minister—I am sorry, I mean Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not sure whether that was a promotion, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am not sure which hon. Members were in the House for the most recent Agriculture Question Time, but those who were present will recall the assertive way in which the Minister said that the Government were on the verge of resolving quota hopping. Those of us who follow such matters closely saw the great build-up to his visit to Plymouth, where he was to announce his plan to tackle quota hopping. Many of us wondered what the Government's secret weapon was.

[Dr. Strang]

Hon. Members now know what the secret weapon was: English lessons for Spanish fishermen. That is what the Minister said. We would tackle the problem of quota hopping not just by the Spanish, but presumably also by the Dutch, by requiring those fishermen to speak English before they were given a licence to fish against our national quota. I give way to the Minister if he wants to add to that.

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman knows full well how we are going to resolve the issue of quota hoppers. We have made clear to the House the change in the protocols, and I made that clear in my speech. The hon. Gentleman misunderstood some tongue-in-cheek comments by me. On the day the Spanish Prime Minister visited the UK, he was subjected to far more questions on quota hopping than on any other issue. He went away in no doubt that that the matter had to be resolved. That is what those comments in Plymouth achieved: we have ensured that everyone in Europe realises that the problem will not go away and must be solved.

Dr. Strang: It is certainly a problem that must be solved. That is the second time the Minister has referred to all the questions put by journalists to the Spanish Minister of Agriculture. I very much doubt whether all the questions from all the journalists, whether in Plymouth, London or anywhere else, have the Spanish Government shaking in their shoes and saying, "We are certainly going to agree to change that in the IGC."

The Labour party is determined to address the issue of quota hopping.

Mr. Mans: How?

Dr. Strang: I have explained that we could have tackled the issue during the 1992 review. That was not done. If the Labour party comes to power, it will be before the completion of the intergovernmental conference, and Ministers know that. Clearly, an incoming Labour Government could—I put it no stronger than that—pick up the hand. I was simply saying to the House and the country that we shall attach a high priority to the quota hopping issue. As the Foreign Secretary stated yesterday and the Prime Minister mentioned again today, there is no question that we can go on with quota hopping on such a scale.

Conservative Members have made great play of the fact that the Opposition will vote against the Government tonight. They must be living in some dream world. The Minister knows perfectly well from the reception that he and his predecessors have received when they have visited fishing ports that no amount of media management will alter the fact that the Government's record on fisheries policy is one of failure. Seventeen years of successive Conservative Governments have meant 17 years of failure in fisheries policy. The Opposition amendment is designed to advance the case of the fishing industry and fishing communities throughout the United Kingdom. I appeal to right hon. and hon. Members to support it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next hon. Member, I should tell the House that 13 hon. Members wish to speak in the remaining two and a half hours or so. May we have modest-length speeches?

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): As always, I listened with great care to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman. I must confess that I was a little baffled at the beginning of his speech but even more so by the end. I cannot understand why, since they agree precisely with what the Government are doing—at the moment at any rate—the Opposition are forcing a Division. I know that doing so is politics, to which I shall return. Not once during his speech did the hon. Gentleman give a reason for dividing the House on the motion before it. Trying to defeat the Government in such a way is purely opportunistic politics, and I hope that any Conservative Member—or, indeed, any Member on any other Bench—who is thinking of voting with the Opposition will bear that in mind.

Much mention was made in the speech of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East of the Hague preference. Its origins of course lie in a previous Labour Government, which most people may have forgotten because it was a rather long time ago. A former Labour Minister—now Lord Owen—who then represented the west country constituency of Plymouth, Devonport, signed the Hague preference and made the arrangements. It was a political deal. That is the answer to the complaint by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) about the rather mysterious cut-off point at Flamborough head. Northern Britain basically meant Scotland, and Northern Ireland and the south-west were excluded.

Even the part of the world represented by the then Member for Devonport was excluded from the Hague preference because, had it been included, there would have been awful problems with France over Brittany. The Hague preference was a political stitch-up and we are still bearing its consequences, just as the fishing industry, especially in the south-west, has had to bear the consequences of so many other political stitch-ups over the years. I therefore very much welcome my hon. Friend the Minister's comments on that subject. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland—perhaps this is more pertinent—will also very much welcome what was said.

The House will be relieved to know that this is almost certainly my last speech on fisheries matters. I have not missed a fisheries debate in the 13 years that I have had the honour to represent St. Ives. For reasons that are known to most hon. Members, I will not be standing at the next election. I shall miss these debates, which have altered considerably over the years. The times when a small group of us used to debate the issues and actually discuss which matters concerned our fishermen, rather than getting involved, as I am afraid that, inevitably, we have in this debate, in wider political considerations, seem like halcyon days. Before we lose sight of what is before the House, I hope that I may be permitted to comment briefly on some of the proposals that could affect fishermen in my constituency and the south-west constituencies of those represented ably by colleagues on both sides of the House. The fishing industry is very dear to hon. Members who represent the south-west. I am often accused by some of my hon. Friends of banging on about fishing, but the issue runs deep for anyone who has the great honour of representing a fisheries constituency.

Three areas of the Commission proposals that will be considered later this week give concern to the south-west. It must be said that the proposals before us tonight—certainly those concerning the south-west, but generally, too—about which we have not heard much detail so far, are not quite as draconian as others have been over the years.

A number of issues naturally cause concern, the first of which relates to megrim. Western megrim stocks are basically a by-catch, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bear that in mind. There is also the question of monkfish. Although, as I said, this year's proposals do not appear to be draconian, it must be remembered that they are on the back of massive cuts in the monkfish quota four years ago. I hope that my hon. Friend will heed the representations that I know have already been made to him on that point.

The third area of concern relates to a species which is often mentioned—certainly by south-west Members—in the House: channel cod. The complaint is that area VII b-k is huge. Yet the matter really concerns two distinct fish stocks. To lump them together in such a way distorts the fact that, in my part of the world—if I may call it that—there is often what appears to be an abundance of cod. Cod stocks should therefore be separated into more meaningful areas.

I return to what is undoubtedly the background to the debate: the common fisheries policy and the vexed question of quota hoppers. What I believe is common ground between every hon. Member who represents a fishing constituency, wherever they sit in the House, is the view that the CFP is a disaster. It must be torn up and rewritten; we must start again.

I have no doubt that there must be some form of common policy. That is perhaps not a popular thing to say, but it is a fact of life, and I would be deluding people if I said that there was some magic way in which we could just withdraw from the CFP without consequence. Yes, we could withdraw, but there would be consequences. I do not believe that we can withdraw unilaterally from the CFP if we are to stay in the European Union. People would be more honest if they put that clearly, especially to fishermen. It would be more honest to say, "All right, let us come out of the EU, if that is what you want."

As I said earlier, the trouble with the CFP, which was put in place before we entered it, has so often been that it has been built on trade-offs; its consequences so often involve trade-offs. So often, fishing has been at the worse end of a greater trade-off. I hope that for once fishing will benefit, and I believe the Government when they say that they are absolutely determined to tackle the problem of quota hopping.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his solid and sensible work over many years for the fishing industry and for the south-west. If I should be fortunate enough to return here, I shall greatly miss his contributions. He and I have stood side by side on the issue of quota hopping. Does he agree that the original relative stability agreement in 1983 could not stand beside quota hopping and that the two cannot be reconciled? Was it not therefore inevitable that the Single European Act would reduce that original agreement to nonsense?

Is not it also true that the economic implications of what the hon. Gentleman and I seek to do suggest that the only way to get round the problem is either to tear up the single market legislation or to draw down funds—some of which come from our taxpayers' contributions—from Europe for our fishermen, so that they can buy quota from Brussels in the way that the Spanish have over many years?

Mr. Harris: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said about me personally. I am not sure that what he said subsequently was entirely correct. I do not think that quota hopping can be regarded as part of the single market, because there is a great difference between a quota, which applies to a scarce resource, and some manufactured product, which should be the subject of the single market. I have never therefore regarded the problem as arising from the single market.

The judgment of the European Court of Justice in the Factortame case, which has caused the real trouble in recent times, was perverse beyond belief. We cannot have a common fisheries policy that is based on national quota and yet allow companies and individuals from other member states to buy over boats and licences and get access to that national quota. That is happening to an alarming extent, as has been said, and more than 20 per cent. of our quota is now foreign owned. That is an intolerable position.

I gave the Government full marks when they introduced section 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1988, but I wish that they had done it earlier, before Spain came in. Frankly, I wish that they had listened to me and to others who were fighting the scourge of quota hopping—in the old days, the problem was with flag of convenience vessels—as long as 16 years ago. That was the time to take action. Unfortunately, the action that they subsequently took was struck down by the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid–Kent): I am an ingenue in this debate, because I do not represent a fishing constituency, but I have always worried about this quota hopping business, because is it not the case that individual fishermen are entitled to sell their quota on the open market? Would not preventing them from doing that be an interference in one form of freedom in order to achieve another?

Mr. Harris: That could be said, but one must consider the national interest. Many fishermen who are accused of selling their licence to a foreign interest do not know that that is what they are doing, as quite often the licence is sold through a middleman—an agent, for example—who may suggest that it is being sold to another fisherman from this country, whereas in fact it ends up in Spain. I know specific examples of that.

Let me tell my hon. Friends who are considering not supporting the Government tonight that on new year's day this year I was so worried about the plight of the fishing industry that I wrote to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, spelling out the difficulties that the industry faced, not least in the south-west. I rehearsed the problems that all hon. Members who represent fishing communities know only too well. I was especially worried about the entry of Spanish vessels into Irish waters on 1 January; that is why I wrote on that date. In fact, they have not materialised in any great numbers, but the threat is still there.

I said to the Prime Minister—my hon. Friend the Minister will not mind my saying this—that he was the only person who could sort out the problems. I had a meeting with him in February, as a result of which—I believe—he asked his policy unit at Downing street to consider fishing. That inquiry ran in parallel with the Ministry's investigation into the common fisheries policy.

Those who lead the industry—a great industry—were extremely pleased that, within days of that policy review in Downing street beginning, they were invited there, as were I and other hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter) came with me to the meeting, and other hon. Members no doubt had some input. Partly as a result, we have witnessed the emergence of a fishing policy that, although not perfect—frankly, we can never have a perfect policy on fishing—goes a long way towards meeting the well-founded concerns of the fishing industry. In particular, it represents a genuine attempt to deal with quota hopping.

I was delighted to hear the Prime Minister's reply today to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), and the replies given over the past fortnight in the Select Committees on Foreign Affairs and on European Legislation by the Foreign Secretary, by Sir Stephen Wall—the United Kingdom representative to the European Community—and by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis).

All those replies confirmed that dealing with quota hopping would be a condition of our enabling progress to be made at the intergovernmental conference. In other words, we have a veto and we intend to use it. That is the assurance that the Government have given the fishing industry. For that reason alone, I have no hesitation in voting with the Government tonight. I urge my hon. Friends, who care about fishing even though some of them do not represent fishing communities, to vote with the Government tonight. As the House knows, I have never hesitated to vote against the Government on fishing matters—I have done it many times—when I thought that that was in the best interests of the fishing industry. This is not a night to vote against the Government.

I am reinforced in my opinion by what has been said by some of the leaders of the fishing industry over the weekend. I hope that they will forgive me for quoting them. They include my constituent, Mr. Michael Townsend, the chief executive of the Cornish Fish Producers Organisation. He is of course also chairman of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations. He was reported in today's edition of the Western Morning News as saying:

"Fishing has always been cross-party. It's been a non-party issue and we want to keep it like that."

Mr. Jim Portus, the chief executive of the South-West Fish Producers Organisation, urged all Members of Parliament to support the Government.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): He is a Tory.

Mr. Harris: Yes, there is nothing to be ashamed of—I am a Tory, too. The hon. Member knows me well and is aware that I have never hesitated to vote against my Government when I thought that that was in the best interests of the fishing industry.

Today's editorial in the Western Morning News, a paper which no one can accuse of being partisan or Tory, stated:

"Don't sabotage the fishing industry.

The Government faces a knife-edge vote tonight when the EU Fisheries Policy is debated in the Commons. It is its first major test since losing its majority . . . The Opposition may see it as an opportunity to hijack the vote to bring about a crushing defeat for the Government.

But we would urge them not to do so, for the sake of the fishing industry."

For the sake of the fishing industry and for the reasons given by my hon. Friend the Minister, I do not intend to vote against the Government tonight. Even the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East could not find fault with the Government's policy—never mind the record, with which we all find fault—so he cannot urge his hon. Friends to vote against the Government.

I urge everyone on the Conservative Benches and perhaps even members of some of the minority opposition parties to back the Government so that at least my hon. Friend the Minister can attend the forthcoming meeting having won a majority vote and not, as last year, having suffered a defeat. A defeat would damage the fishing industry.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): First, I should like to echo the Minister's congratulations and tributes to the Royal National Mission for Deep Sea Fishermen. It has done a splendid job in the past century, and continues to do so, although it does not operate on the same scale as it did a decade ago.

The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and I share a number of common features. It happens that neither of us will be here after the next general election. I do not want to turn the debate into a mutual admiration society, but more often than not, he and I have shared common ground on fishery matters, and we have frequently been in the same Lobby. I intend to part company with him tonight. Later in my speech, when I outline why we should or should not vote against the Government, we shall part company again. However, we have been adversaries and sometimes allies on the fishing industry, as on one or two other matters.

There is no doubt that losing the majority does wonders for the Government's approach to, for example, a fisheries debate, when they are in danger of being defeated. As I listened to the Minister, I began to wonder whether Christmas had come early. It was as if he had gone through a checklist of all the things about which the fishing industry is unhappy. For example, the Scottish Fishermen's Federation has expressed concern about the Norway agreement on North sea haddock; problems connected with achieving participation in the enhanced north Norway cod agreement; and the Commission's proposals for west of Scotland haddock.

The Minister responded favourably to all those concerns, so much so that I was surprised by some of the reactions to the speech of our spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang). The Minister said that everything was either high priority, or near the top of the list for the negotiations. The truth is, however, that he did not say what was his bottom line. To continue in the Christmas vein, the Minister reminded me a bit of the fairy on the top of a Christmas tree. I am sorry that he is not present, and I hope that he will not take my remarks amiss, but, like that fairy, he is very pretty and glittering, but has delivered nothing.

I do not see why the Opposition should take any lessons from the Conservatives about delivering policy, because the Conservatives are the Government. They have been the Government for so long that they have forgotten that they are the Government, so they do not seek to justify their policy. They seem to spend all their time attacking the Opposition. That is fair game and I do not object to that, except that when we attack them, the Government say that we are indulging in party politics. When they do it, however, they say that they are demonstrating sound common sense.

The House and the fishing industry must understand that there is a contradiction between deregulation and control of the fishing effort and control of the total allowable catch. One cannot opt for deregulation and at the same time expect control, nor can one expect such control to be exercised only on fishermen from other member states. Sometimes one almost thinks that that is what the industry is asking for. The industry understands that, and so must the Government.

That contradiction is at the heart of the common fisheries policy, which is regarded as part of the single market. It is impossible to argue that by analogy, so it is not possible to rebut the strong views of the Fisheries Commissioner, Mrs. Bonino, who says that it is a Common Market and that everyone can go into it. If that logic is followed, there is no common fisheries policy, except one which says that there is no control on effort or on who can catch the fish; instead, we simply have a total free-for-all. That means that everyone would keep on fishing until there were no fish left. If the North sea was regarded as simply part of the single market, that would be the inevitable conclusion, according to Mrs. Bonino. She cannot have it both ways.

We must opt for quotas and total allowable catches. I know of no one in the House or within the industry who disagrees with the proposition that there must be such controls. No one believes that, not even those who think that we should withdraw from the common fisheries policy, tear it up and start again. They argue for that not because they are in favour of a free-for-all, but because they believe that they can introduce stronger controls based on national interest.

The Fisheries Commissioner must cast aside the idea that the common fisheries policy is part of the single market. Those in the fishing industry must accept that if we are to have controls and regulations, and although the price may be great in some instances, we cannot afford to reject out of hand the possibility of satellite surveillance. If that proves to be the best way to check the direction of vessels and which waters they are or are not supposed to be in, I do not think that we can reject such a proposal. The industry must accept that it may have to swallow some unpalatable pills, whose consequences are necessary in the long run. I therefore do not reject satellite surveillance proposals.

I am glad that we have a full day for the debate. Our common objective in the past 17 years and beyond has been stability for the present and the future—without that, there can be no future planning. We want to know what is happening and we do not want quotas and TACs to change year on year, up and down like a yo-yo. We want certainty.

As the hon. Member for St. Ives and the Front-Bench spokesmen have said, the key issue is quota hopping. I was shadow transport spokesman when the first attempt was made to put the matter right. On behalf of the Opposition, I said that we would give the Government fair wind and would not frustrate the legislation. That action might be used against me tonight—it always is. In Committee on the Merchant Shipping Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) said that he did not believe that the Government were going the right way about it. We did not, however, try to stop the legislation. I do not blame the Government for getting it wrong, because they were attempting to get it right. That example shows that there has often been a bipartisan approach to the issue.

The Government's position is that the issue will be resolved at the intergovernmental conference. I would feel slightly happier if fishing was the only matter at issue at the IGC, but there are other matters to be discussed. We know of at least one other matter, and I suspect that the Prime Minister has a list as long as one's arm of the things that he wants changed. The trouble is that we have heard all this before. The Government talk tough, but they usually fail to deliver.

I do not want to extend the debate—clearly, it would be out of order if I did—but the Government have not delivered on bovine spongiform encephalopathy. The Prime Minister came back from Florence and said that, as a result of the Florence agreement, the ban on beef exports would be lifted by the end of November or the beginning of December. This afternoon, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food changed his mind and said that he would do things that he had ruled out a couple of months before, but there is still no end to the beef ban. Nobody knows when the ban will be lifted.

We remember also the Madrid conference where, again, there was a dispute during attempts to reach agreement among the Heads of State. At Madrid, the Spanish Prime Minister said to our Prime Minister, "I will not sign up unless Spanish vessels are given early access to British waters." Our Prime Minister said, "Okay. Fine. We agree." He gave way, and that, unfortunately, has been the history—fishing has always been a bargaining counter in almost every conference or agreement. Fishing always loses out. The hon. Member for St. Ives referred to the Hague preference as a stitch-up, but what is a prudent agreement and what is a stitch-up probably depends on the side of the House on which one sits. One thing about which I am certain is that fishing has always lost out, and neither main party has been able to ensure that that is not the case when in power.

One of the reasons why we cannot trust the Government is that they always have to say how well they have done. For example, on the working time directive, Ministers said that we had a great opt-out and were making changes. They were satisfied that the working time directive did not apply to us—they had won the battle. But what happened? They lost the battle, and they are now bleating about it.

One of our problems is that the political arguments do not help. I saw on the BBC teletext service today—a slightly different story was told in the House, I admit—that the Prime Minister had come to a cosy deal with the Ulster Unionists about the Northern Ireland fishing industry. As a concession to the Ulster Unionist Members of Parliament—

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: Just hear me out. The Prime Minister came to a deal, because he needed the votes of Ulster Unionist Members to avoid defeat. I do not know whether there is a shred of truth in that story, and if there is, I do not blame the Ulster Unionist Members, who are using their position to get the best they can for their industry. But that is not the right way to run fishing policy. Bargaining with a little bit here and a little bit there is not the answer. The Government might see a Conservative Member who may vote against them tonight and offer to take care of the problem in his constituency. Sadly, that is not the way to go about it.

The trouble is that all this talk about the intergovernmental conference is simply hot air, because the Prime Minister knows only too well that he will not be at the next IGC. After the election, the right hon. Gentleman might not even be the Leader of the Opposition. He might well be sitting where the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) currently sits, and the hon. Gentleman might well be the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nicholls: This is a serious debate.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, it is a serious debate. The Prime Minister cares about only one thing—survival. He is treating the House of Commons as if it were a hospice for the terminally ill—he is trying to dull the pain and alleviate distress until the inevitable end comes.

Mr. William Ross: The hon. Gentleman suggested some time ago that he believed the fairy tales put about by the media. He should understand by now that as every other Opposition Member is known always to vote against the Government almost regardless of the issue, the Ulster Unionists are the only Members about whom the media can speculate. Therefore, speculation is rife, and very often wrong. I can tell him that, on this occasion, the view expressed by the media about a cosy deal is totally without foundation.

Mr. Hughes: I am glad that I allowed the hon. Gentleman to put that on the record. I said that I was not concerned one way or the other whether there was a shred of truth in the story. We are all honourable Members in this place, and I take his word that no cosy deal has been done. It may be that a cosy deal was offered, but we shall leave that aside.

The one fortunate thing is that the end of this Government is not far away—it is four to five months away. It will then be for my right hon. and hon. Friends to take up the cudgels to obtain changes to the CFP, to give it stability and justice. I hope that whoever follows the hon. Member for St. Ives and me into this House will be as strong in their defence of the fishing industry as he has been. For that reason, I shall be voting against the Government. I want to bring them down as soon as possible, and I hope that we can do so.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) berated the Government in somewhat quieter tones than the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang). I have great respect for the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East, especially for his views on agricultural policy, which we seem almost to share. I take it that he was as responsible as anyone for drafting the Labour amendment. I can think of only one word to describe the amendment, and I fear that it may be out of order. I can think of no more elegant phraseology than that word, which is "humbug".

The hon Member for Edinburgh, East berated with fury what has gone on for the past 17 years, but has he forgotten what he was doing in 1976? In that year, Community law was laid down in a regulation governing the future direction of the CFP. At the heart of that policy was the principle of equal access, so that we in this country and our fishermen had no more right to the waters that had previously been ours than any of the other member states. From that has stemmed all the troubles that we have with the CFP.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East will know that in 1976 the then Labour Government had a veto, which they did not exercise. If only they had exercised that veto and prevented the 1976 regulation from coming about, we would not have had any of the consequences for the past 17 years, about which he has complained. But that is not what he did, nor what that Government did. I think that I am right in saying that he was in an office that had some influence over those matters.

I commiserate with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who has a miserable job—it is an impossible job. He knows, as do all of us with an interest in any part of the fishing industry, that we could once again have a fishing industry as large and as prosperous as it was many years ago. But we cannot have that prosperity again—it is not possible—as long as we do not have the same rights to waters as those enjoyed by any self-governing nation state of the world. That is the truth of the matter.

As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has said many times before, we have lost that right of control and until we regain it, we shall never have an effective conservation policy and we shall never restore our fishing stocks. Furthermore, we shall never be able to deal with industrial fishing, which has now become an evil because it sweeps up millions of undersized fish which, in times past, would have been left in the sea to mature so as to be caught at a later stage when they were worth eating.

In the North sea, the numbers of five important species are now so dangerously low that they are nearing the point of irreversible decline. Those are herring, mackerel, cod, plaice and sole—five species that have been on the plates of all hon. Members many times. They are popular species and we should sustain those resources permanently, in large quantities, as they were sustained in the past. In the North sea, stocks have now fallen so low that we might soon reach an irreversible position. I hope that the Minister is aware of that problem and knows that it is deeply serious.

All of us who have any part of the fishing industry in our constituencies know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State has travelled up and down the country explaining the Government's difficulties and their policies. He has been listening and learning and many fishermen appreciate what he has been trying to do. However, I wish that he would not use the term "non-negotiable" in respect of our six to 12-mile limit. That term is causing some anger among many fishermen because, if one says that those fishing rights are non-negotiable, it suggests that their ownership is ours, that we have a right to them and that we will not concede that right. The fact is that we conceded those rights long ago, when we entered the European Community. Those waters are as much Community waters as those beyond the 12-mile limit.

Let me underline that point. If my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who is a lawyer, were my landlord who had given me a 10-year lease, and I were to go round telling my neighbours that I would continue to have possession and that my rights were non-negotiable, as a lawyer and a landlord, my hon. Friend would tell me that I was deceiving myself and my neighbours. I therefore urge him to abandon the term "non-negotiable". I know what he means, but his use of a phrase that fishermen resent is not doing him any good.

Fishermen feel that over the years they have been deceived, I regret to say, by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The Liberal Democrats have probably been the worst offenders and the Scottish and Welsh nationalists have been no better. I have to admit that the Ulster Unionists on both sides of the House have probably behaved in the most frank and honest manner in respect of the fishing industry.

The time has now come for us to be frank with the fishing industry and to say that our hands are tied and that there is a limit to what we can do. I appreciate what my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) has said about the common fisheries policy. He has denounced it with great charm and great firmness, but the only real answer is to reassert ourselves. To concede that we should have a common fisheries policy of any kind is unwise and unnecessary. If we are to have a successful Community that is to enlarge to include 25, 30 or more countries, we have to forget about having a common fisheries policy. It would be impossible and absurd to allow countries such as Estonia and Latvia, which have their own fishing fleets, to have equal access with ours.

As part of any enlargement, we have to say that every member state should have its own fishing policy. Let us act as if we were a self-governing nation state, with control of our own waters, so that we can have a prosperous fishing industry in future.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body). He attacked my party and other Opposition parties, but it is fair to say that, after fisheries debates in recent years, we have found ourselves in the Lobby in support of the fishing industry more often than have Conservative Members. When he raises the red herring of access to waters, he must know that the derogation has been challenged in the courts by the Spaniards and that that case failed.

New members of the Community are generally excluded from waters that they have not traditionally fished and there is no reason to suspect that Estonia will be treated any more favourably, unless it gives us a major concession that blinds the Minister of the day. That is unlikely. To put up such Aunt Sallies does not help, because it increases uncertainty within the industry. Mrs. Bonino has indicated that there is no likelihood of the derogation on the six to 12-mile limit being challenged in the 2002 review.

I welcome the widespread attention being given to our annual fisheries debate and I am grateful to the Government's business managers for allowing it additional time. The Minister of State's tour of fishing ports around the country, trying to woo hon. Members, was interesting. My hon. Friends and I were speculating about how he would try to woo the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), but he was not prepared to compromise on a unilateral renunciation of the common fisheries policy. We look forward with interest to seeing whether enough has been said this evening to persuade the hon. Member for Ludlow.

Despite all the political attention focused on the vote at the end of the debate, we should not lose sight of the fact that we are considering the details of a regulation that will have a considerable impact in the forthcoming year on the lives and the livelihoods of fishermen and on the communities to which they belong, from Shetland to Cornwall. Against that background, I hope that the Minister will respond to several pertinent questions, many of which have already been raised and to some of which the Minister has already referred. When he winds up, I hope that the Under–Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), will be able to take them on.

Traditionally, much of the December debate focuses on the total allowable catches—or TACs—for the next year. The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and I have taken part in many of these debates over the years. We both first spoke in December 1983 and at that time, as in subsequent years, the Minister's remit at the Fisheries Council was that he should unequivocally negotiate the best deal for our fishermen. Of course, when TACs were negotiated at Fisheries Councils in the past, most of them were taken up by British fishermen. The position is different in respect of the TACs to be negotiated at this week's Fisheries Council: 44 per cent. of the plaice quota, 46 per cent. of the hake quota, 20 per cent. of the sole quota, and 29 per cent. of the anglers quota—all high-value species—will be fished by non-British fishermen. That is a result of the quota hopping that has been the subject of much of the discussion so far and to which I shall return.

Representations from fishing organisations have highlighted many of their concerns and, although I would agree with the hon. Member for St. Ives that the list is not quite as long as in some years, the points they raise are important. It is generally felt that the pelagic settlement is reasonably satisfactory, but disappointment is expressed at the fact that, despite the industry having taken a 50 per cent. cut in the TAC for herring earlier this year, the cut in sprats is only half that amount. Given that sprat fishing takes up a number of juvenile herring, that issue should be re-examined.

The Minister may wish to say something about the deal that was struck at the weekend on Atlanto-Scandian herring, which is welcomed by the industry. The EU amount is less in the forthcoming year, but it is thought that, given that fishermen will be allowed to fish some of it in Norwegian and Faroese waters and land in Norway, it has considerable value. It would be helpful if the Minister would say that there will be no impediment to British vessels starting fishing that on 1 January 1997, so that they can start establishing a track record for what may be a very important fishery for the future.

From a Scots perspective, with regard to the white fish species, there is major concern about the significant cut in the TAC for west of Scotland haddock, as the Minister of State acknowledged in response to a question by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). It is believed that the scientific evidence might justify a status quo for haddock; I hope, especially as it is a precautionary TAC, that Ministers will focus their minds on that in the forthcoming Council meeting.

Similar consideration applies to North sea haddock, where the TAC cut comes in the wake of a significant cut in the cod quota. Many people accept the need for tougher measures with regard to cod, to conserve a seriously depleted stock, but it does not follow that there should be the same cut for haddock, especially as it is possible to fish haddock clean of cod. I hope that North sea haddock will be given special attention.

There is scepticism about the precautionary TAC for west of Scotland saithe, a problem which might be better resolved by uplifting the TAC than by invoking the Hague preference, which has been a subject of some discussion.

On the subject of cod, there are obvious difficulties in fishing in the North sea and west of Scotland. The Minister will confirm that there is an increase in the cod available in north Norway for Community vessels. I shall not go into individual constituency cases now, but I hope that the Minister will accept that there is an opportunity for vessels from the Scottish fleet to go to north Norway, and that any representations that he receives on that will receive sympathetic consideration.

From the perspective south of the border, I know that the Minister is aware that on North Sea plaice, it is feared that the European Union agreement with Norway produced a situation where a swift recovery of stocks might lead to a dislocation in the industry, whereas a slower recovery, by retaining the status quo at 81,000 tonnes, would be helpful in maintaining the well-being of those who have been fishing plaice in the North sea.

A similar view is taken on the disproportionate cut in North Sea sole quota. I understand that, at last year's Council, there was direct negotiation with Norway on plaice. I hope that the Minister can confirm that, if it comes to it, he will be prepared to do that again.

The industry believes that, unlike other areas, the Irish sea boasts stable stocks of cod, and that a higher TAC there, thus avoiding Hague preference, would be better for English and Ulster fishermen.

We were told by the Minister of State that the industry had generally signed up to a review of the Hague preference. I understand that the Scottish Fishermen's Federation was told about the proposal at a meeting that the Minister of State came into today and that some things were said about it, but it certainly could not be thought that the federation had signed up to it.

I say as constructively as I can that, obviously, the issue is sensitive. In fisheries debates we have often appealed to Ministers to invoke the Hague preference, which has brought benefits over the years. It does not help if people feel that they have been bounced into a position that they have not. I hope that a greater sensitivity on that issue will be shown, perhaps even by the Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office when he replies to the debate.

I know that the Under-Secretary of State is especially concerned about salmon farming, which is a matter for the Council. He knows, as we all do, that the Government eventually agreed to apply to the Commission for a minimum import price. That has not been forthcoming. Apparently, Mrs. Bonino gave the Minister short shrift when he went on a special errand to try to get it. Is it possible for the Council to take the matter into its hands? It is intolerable that some of the most efficient salmon farmers in Scotland—in Shetland, my constituency—are obliged to sell their product at below production cost. As the Minister knows, that is unsustainable. An emergency response is needed, and we very much hope that he can make progress on that.

I said that in the past, and in relation to the current round, fishermen have expressed scepticism about some of the TACs that have been set. People might argue that the fishermen would say that because they want to fish more, but self-evidently it is not in the interests of the fishing industry to kill off the stocks on which it and future generations will depend. We should not dismiss the experience and expertise that skippers can contribute to the inexact science of stock assessments.

Mr. Salmond: I did not realise that the hon. Gentleman had left the subject of salmon farming. Is he aware that, at the weekend, a former Commissioner, a Mr. Bruce Millan, attributed the failure of the Scottish junior Minister to achieve satisfactory results to ministerial inexperience? Regardless of whether it was inexperience, it was certainly a very belated effort.

Mr. Wallace: The House well knows that we argued for some time before the Cabinet would accept the position. I am not sure that it helps the Minister in his attempt to win something for us at the weekend if we all denounce him as being inexperienced. I know that the Minister and the Scottish Office have taken a very positive approach to that. Our complaint lay with other Departments. Now that, at long last, the Government have got a line on that, we wish the Minister well and hope that he can negotiate something positive for the salmon farming industry at the end of the week.

I was saying that, in proposing radical reform of the common fisheries policy, Liberal Democrats recommend the decentralisation of management, with the involvement of skippers and fisheries scientists. That would lead to better informed decision making, and decisions to which people have contributed are more likely to command their confidence and active co-operation.

What the Minister of State said today, repeating almost verbatim one of the points that he made in the 10-point plan that he unveiled in Plymouth, gives us cause for hope that that approach—a much more regional dimension, local management of fisheries—will gain momentum. As the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) said, Liberal Democrats have called for that in many debates. Sometimes Ministers have tried to rubbish us, but we will always welcome the sinner that repents. We only regret the fact that it has taken 17 years and a minority Government to bring about their repentance, but we encourage them in developing that line of thinking.

That was one of the recommendations of the common fisheries policy review group, in which my constituent, Mr. John Goodlad, played a constructive and distinguished part. When do the Government intend to respond formally to the 40 or more recommendations of the review group? The Minister said that that would happen in the near future, but following such a high-quality, constructive report, we want a better idea of the timetable for a response and implementation.

I agreed with many of the report's conclusions, including the non-viability of renouncing the common fisheries policy unilaterally and the need to boost decommissioning, to consider a scrap and build policy and to consider other institutional arrangements, including regionalism.

There are immediate issues to be dealt with, including the position on multi-annual guidance programme IV and flags of convenience. As we have heard time and again tonight, the two are linked, not solely because of the linkage that the Government have stated, but because it is unreasonable to set a further MAGP requirement for Britain when we are purporting to negotiate the removal from the fisheries register of 20 per cent. of the fleet flying the Union flag as a matter of convenience.

Do the Government intend to make any negotiations on quota hopping retrospective? The Government have said that they have taken the initiative by seeking a solution to the problem in the IGC, but what do they mean by a solution? Will it apply to future transfers of licences or will there be a retrospective element?

What is being done to pursue the initiative? The hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), in an intervention, suggested that the reference to that important aspect of our negotiations on the IGC had been dropped from the Irish proposals and relegated to an appendix. I understand that there was a four-line reference to it on page 134 under the heading, "Part B—Other Issues". I am not sure that that is the type of profile that has been presented to us in the House. What profile are Ministers seeking for that? How often have member state capitals been visited by Ministers or by departmental senior officials to promote the ideas? I do not expect the Minister to show us his full negotiating hand, but we would like to be reassured that there is some tangible evidence of progress. His winding-up speech will give the Minister an opportunity to transmit such a message, not just to the House but to the fishing industry.

Related to that is a point that I raised in an intervention. What precisely is the Government's attitude to MAGP IV? Last June, the Minister was talking about assembling a blocking minority. In October, in a letter to the Scottish Fishermen's Federation, the Prime Minister said:

"we have made it clear that we will not implement further compulsory cuts in the UK fleet while the quota hopping issue remains unresolved".

The Minister of State gave a complex reply to that question, replying further to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East that the Government were not contemplating such action. We want to know whether this is a question of trying to block the provision, or whether it is a question of allowing an agreement to be reached by the other member states which we will not implement. It is important for that to be clarified. Those issues—quota-hopping and capacity reduction—have crept up on the Government because of their neglect in the past.

The hon. Member for St Ives (Mr. Harris) said that his reason for voting for the Government tonight was the response that he had received from the Prime Minister to a letter that he had sent him on 1 January earlier this year. The response that I have had is my reason for voting against the Government. Where were they for 17 years, if it is only now that they have woken up and have what the hon. Gentleman described as a fisheries policy?

It is not as if the Government were not warned. At the time when pressure stock licences were introduced, some of us argued that, rather than being sold on, they should revert to a pool and perhaps be reallocated, thus ensuring that the remoter fishing communities of our country would not lose out through the licences' being drawn away to—as many of us thought—other parts of the United Kingdom, or, as has in fact happened, to other countries. The monetary ethic of Thatcherism prevailed, however. In time, many skippers found that the best offers came from foreign vessel owners. Nothing was done about the problem during our presidency in 1992, and it remains today.

Throughout the late 1980s and early 1990s, many Opposition Members and some exceptional Conservative Members—the hon. Member for St Ives was one, and we heard especially distinguished contributions from the late Alick Buchanan-Smith—argued for a well-funded decommissioning scheme, but too little was done too late. As a result, as other European Union countries, notably Spain, now receive grants to modernise their fleet, our fleet, unaided, grows older. That is due either to wilful neglect or to a cavalier disregard for the industry on which so many livelihoods depend, both at sea and on shore, in communities where alternative employment can be scarce.

We have heard much rhetoric, but the details of implementation have been scanty. The amendment that has been selected—like the amendment tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends and me—calls the Government to account for their stewardship of fisheries policies over the past 17 years. Regrettably, it has been a record of neglect and failure, and we will vote against the Government tonight.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I must point out that nine hon. Members wish to speak in the 97 minutes that are available before the winding-up speeches. I hope that, with a bit of co-operation, they will all be able to do so.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): The fishing industry in Northern Ireland continues to suffer one blow after another as a result of policies dictated by the common fisheries policy in Brussels.

Let me remind the House of the vital importance of the fishing industry to Northern Ireland's economy. More than 2,000 people are employed in the industry, with another 1,200 actively engaged on fishing trawlers. The entire industry is worth more than £20 million per year to the Northern Ireland economy. In recent years, however, the industry has suffered one major crisis after another. Each year, fishermen's livelihoods are put in jeopardy as a result of annual cuts in the fishing quotas in the Irish sea, and this year is no exception.

[Rev. Ian Paisley]

Once again, we face the prospect of Irish sea fishing quotas' being reduced from a level that is already intolerable. Since 1990, the total allowable catch in the Irish sea has been reduced by 40 per cent. We are saying that we cannot take any more reductions: if the TAC is reduced any further, there will be no fleet left. Those are the stern, hard facts that the Northern Ireland fishing industry faces. This year, it is proposed that the cod quota should remain at 6,200 tonnes, and the sole quota at 1,000 tonnes. Whiting, however, is down 30 per cent. from 9,000 to 6,400 tonnes, and plaice from 2,450 to 1,800. The herring catch has been restricted to 7,000 tonnes.

Along with the leader of the SDLP—who, like me, happens to be a Member of the European Parliament—and accompanied by the chairmen of Mourne, Newtownards and Down councils and their staff and councillors and the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), I was part of a delegation that met the top brass of the fishing commission. We were amazed at its ignorance of what was happening in the Irish sea. Its members told us that fish were scarce, saying, "We are only doing this to give you some industry." They said that conservation must take place.

Before we went there, the commission told the fishermen that they could not have any more haddock out of the sea—that they were very scarce. Well, there are more haddock in the Irish sea tonight than there have been since Noah's Ark floated on the waters. The commission's leading expert admitted something to is: he said, "When I was told that there were haddock in the Irish sea and that they were spawning, I did not believe it, but I went on my own and discovered that the fishermen were right." Why cannot those fishermen take the haddock out of the sea? That expert also confirmed something about herring. It is more than ever possible to fish for herring in the Irish sea—and not red herring.

We were told that nephrops—or prawns, as they are commonly called—were ample and abundant; yet the proposal is to keep the fishermen from fishing for them. What sort of scheme is this so-called common fisheries policy? That is what the fishermen who are sitting in the Strangers Gallery are asking, and rightly so. Why can they not fish for the fish that are plentiful? We look to the Government to do something.

There has been talk of the Hague preference. In 1992, a Minister promised in the House of Lords that the Government were determined to do something about the Hague preference in regard to the Irish sea. What did they do? They did nothing. Meanwhile, our fishermen must watch the spectacle of fishermen from the Republic—when the Republic takes up its option—coming into their fishing grounds, and fishing freely where our men are not allowed to fish for their own fish. That must cease.

I understand the worry about the Hague preference expressed by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). In certain cases, it gave precedence to extra fish for British fishermen, but in the Irish sea we have a problem different from problems anywhere else. The Government must face up to that problem, and a satisfactory result must be found.

The Irish Republic has a very liberal quota and from its point of view it is right to say that there are not many fish in the Irish sea. The fewer fish that it says there are the better a quota it will have and the more it can ask for the Hague preference to be brought into play. I can understand Irish Ministers saying, "We have to be careful about the Irish sea or we shall take everything out of it." It suits their policy to say that.

Where there are fish in abundance people should be allowed to catch them. Northern Ireland fishermen are told, "Your catch has been reduced by 40 per cent. Now cut it again by 30 per cent. to give a total cut of 70 per cent." Next year, they will suggest that we cut it by another 10 per cent. Day after day our fishing industry is being decimated. I pity Northern Ireland Members who have fishing interests in their constituencies. We come here and speak about the industry and travel to Brussels but evidently there are to be no changes.

The Government should look at the Lassen report although, of course, it has been overtaken by other matters. It suggested reducing our fleet by another 40 per cent. It might as well state that we should give up the industry altogether. Now it has come up with another view of segmentation of the fleet, and that would be disastrous. Fishermen tell me that, because of its capacity, it would be impossible to do that with the Northern Ireland fleet.

Our prawn fisheries have also been attacked because it is said that prawns are scarce. But even the scientists say that there are plenty of prawns and Lassen is one of Europe's top officials. There is grave concern about the technical conservation measures that are being proposed by the Commission. They include measures about the size of the nets, the size of fish that can be landed and the areas in which fish can be caught.

In the Irish sea the proposals take no account of the regional diversities of home waters. For example, prawns are one of the most important stocks for Ulster fishermen, but the Commission proposes to increase the minimum landing size from 70 mm to 105 mm overnight. There is no justification for that and scientists are arguing about it. Even the Department's scientists advise us that if this measure is introduced in the Irish sea we would have to forget about 60 per cent. of all the prawns that are currently fished: 60 per cent. would be lost. What is left to fishermen who are faced with such percentages? The Government must go to Europe and save us from the discrimination that seems to be applied to Northern Ireland's fishermen. There is a vendetta to destroy the Province's entire fishing fleet. It is a matter of life and death.

We hear much about decommissioning, but what do Northern Ireland fishermen do when their vessels have been decommissioned? They have nowhere to go. Are we to say to those people, "Although there are plenty of fish you must decommission your boat"? A fishermen told me, "I thought that it was best for me to decommission, and I did. I did my best to start a company with the money but I had many problems and I was unable to run a viable company. I had to buy another vessel to eke out some sort of living in what I was brought up to do."

The Government must adopt a vigorous stance in Europe. This is a fight for the existence of our fleet. It is a scandal that other member states, notably the Spanish, are effectively exporting their overcapacity problem to the United Kingdom by being allowed to operate vessels under the British flag and fish against our quotas. Government commitments on that issue must be honoured. No longer should our fishing industry have to work under the regime of a European fishing policy that is crushing to death the industry in Northern Ireland.

In 1992 the European Commission report entitled "Regional, Socio-economic Studies in the Fisheries Sectors" stated that Northern Ireland was the one area where fishing should be maintained as a priority because of unemployment. But what has happened? Many people in Northern Ireland wonder why the European Union strives to spend hundreds of millions of pounds in Northern Ireland—and of course that money is welcome—while adopting measures under the common fisheries policy which have the inevitable effect of making redundant people who are active in one of Ulster's most important industries.

The Government must recognise the tragic situation of fishing in Northern Ireland. They must not give us words: they must return from Europe having taken action that we can see.

8.6 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The Minister started by painting a rather glowing picture of the industry. He said that it was prosperous, well-invested and coming along well under his ministrations. But the reality is rather different. The industry is in severe financial difficulties. It is not making enough to invest and finds it difficult even to keep going. Many people have to continue to fish to maintain a return on the borrowing with which they are lumbered. That is the real state of the industry and it is why British licences have been sold to quota hoppers.

I want to smash the television screen every time I see a European Commission official saying that British fishermen have sold licences to Spanish fishermen. They did that because they were in debt and were not making enough money. The Spanish were able to buy those licences because they had reached their multi-annual guidance targets by reflagging many of their vessels as British and therefore got access to European funds. That brought them within the target and opened the route to European money, but by the same token our fishermen were above their target and did not have access to European money and were forced to sell their vessels. It is a vicious circle.

The industry is not as prosperous as the Minister says. It faces threats and uncertainties and a reluctance by financial institutions to lend it money. That is one of the real problems. There is no confidence in the future because of constant threats of massive shutdowns and cuts in the British fleet, which has not had adequate backing from the Government, and because the common fisheries policy is not only wrong, as several Ministers have said, but is a conservation disaster.

The CAP is so disastrous that I am surprised that it has not been endorsed by the Spice Girls because it is on the same level as the disaster that the Government are achieving. The Commissioner is disastrous. Commissioner Bonino changes her mind so often that it seems from reading the press releases that there is a different Commissioner every month. She goes in for frequent changes of policy. She said at the beginning that she did not want the portfolio and did not understand it. She has demonstrated that at some length over the years.

The policy puts fishermen in competition with each other so that the natural character of fishermen to be hunters is not alleviated by any tendency to make them harvesters and get them to work together. They are compelled to compete, largely through the quota system and although quotas are an acceptable way to divide catches, they are disastrous when they are used for management purposes. They lead inevitably to discards. Fish caught over quota or fish that are outside quota are just dumped back in the sea—dead. As the quotas come down, the discards go up. The system forces fishermen into either discarding fish on an increasing scale or into illegalities.

The system is still not adequately policed because the control at ports of landing in Europe is totally inadequate. They do not care about British quotas. Why should they bother to enforce them? Vessels, particularly the quota hoppers, land not here, but in Europe, where they are not adequately policed.

Some quota hoppers of course come here to collect benefit, not to land fish. We cannot have a proper policy unless we have effective European policing. The policy goes for broad, lowest common denominator measures that will not work, such as the proposed increase in the mesh size to 110 mm. That is too big to provide an economic future for fishing.

I find it appalling that the industry's proposals for conservation—I refer in particular to those from the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations in 1993—have never yet had a considered reply. They are the path of the future. They include technical and national measures and greater control for the coastal state. The NFFO put them to the Government, but there was no answer. Without consulting the industry, the Government made their own proposals to the European Commission, which came back with appalling conservation programmes that would never have worked.

The Commission insisted, for instance, on dealing with the Spanish catching and landing of small fish by reducing minimum landing sizes. It tried to deal with the discards problem by providing that discards did not have to be dumped overboard immediately, but could be carried until the end of the voyage, which we know means outside British waters, where the fish would almost certainly be landed before they were required to be dumped.

The only sensible proposals on conservation have come from the NFFO. It has proposed square mesh panels. The Commission has made that messy by insisting that such panels should be the same size as diamond mesh panels, which is impracticable. The NFFO has proposed a ban on industrial fishing, which we need immediately, and a system of sustainable fishing, which is to be achieved partly by more selective fishing, which is right in itself, but partly by technical conservation measures under the management of the coastal state.

That is the future. We need to devolve power down, under what might be called subsidiarity in other mouths, from Brussels and from the Commission to management by the coastal state and, within that, to regional management systems that involve people fishing in the region. In other words, we need systems that empower, involve and bring fishermen into consultation with scientists because there is far too little of that. The fishermen feel that they are being totally ignored and that their practical knowledge has been rejected. The systems should empower them to manage the system.

The Minister has moved a little way by talking of regional measures, but those are consultative proposals. We need regional management structures that involve fishermen in their own fate to make them stakeholders in their industry and to give them responsibility for feeling that it is their fish, so ensuring that they work together for the common purpose.

All that has been proposed by the NFFO and by North East Lincolnshire council. We shall put those proposals to the Minister. That is the way that the industry needs to go for power to be handed down from Brussels and for the producer organisations not only to manage their quotas, but to stop the transfer of licences outside their region. We have had a steady drain of Grimsby quotas to Scotland.

Under pressure from the House, the Minister has moved some way in our direction. I approve of his proposals on quota hoppers. I ask him not to agree to multi-annual guidance programme IV until quota hoppers are taken out of the equation. If he does agree to cuts in effort, they must be made after quota hoppers have been taken out of the equation because 20 per cent. of our fleet is made up of quota hoppers. The reduction in effort that will be demanded of us under MAGP IV is about 20 per cent. Take out the quota hoppers and we are bang on target and we have access to European funding. That is the way to go. The Minister must therefore resist MAGP IV until quota hoppers are taken out of the equation.

I hope that the Minister will resist too the barmy proposals—I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) who spoke earlier—on satellite monitoring because they will be divisive in the fleet in relation to vessels over 24 m. The proposals will be expensive and who pays? As usual in Britain, the fishermen will be asked to pay. The proposals will provide no guide to what fishermen are doing. If a boat is sat there with either its satellite transmitter or engine broken, it is committing an illegality under the system. It reduces other methods of control in favour of this broad brush approach that will not work.

I am not as critical of the Minister this year as I have been in previous years. He has helped and moved a considerable way in the direction of sense, particularly on quota hoppers, but also in considering regional structures and in giving a greater role to the coastal state. Having pushed him this far, we should vote against him to push him further because, obviously, nothing works on the Government as effectively as a lost vote, which produces the sort of help and support that they have denied to the industry.

The basic problem in the Government's approach has been that fishing has been hit by a double whammy. It has had a battering from Europe by a common fisheries policy that is unworkable, unsuitable and damaging to our industry. That has been compounded by the withholding of Government help, which has been provided to every other competing industry in Europe, but not to ours. That is the double whammy. The industry has been hit both ways.

At last the Minister has begun to do something about Europe. We shall encourage him to do something about the financing of the industry so that we can have a genuine scrap-and-build programme, and a genuine plan for fishing to restore confidence, for modernisation of our fishing boats and for giving confidence to institutions putting money into the industry so that financial institutions respond. We will be able to get something done about the fishing industry's needs by voting against the Government tonight.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): As someone who has represented a fishing port for 17 years, I have seen the industry progressively damaged by the common fisheries policy. In retrospect, we must be honest: it is clear that the industry was betrayed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), who signed up to a treaty that forced the United Kingdom to surrender British fishing grounds to Europe. The industry was equally betrayed by the late Lord Wilson, who, at the time of the renegotiation, did not put the treaty right.

Fish inside our waters have ceased to be a national resource and today are a Community resource. It has always seemed strange to me that we pump up oil from the North sea and that oil is British oil, but the fish swimming around the oil rigs are European fish.

Leaving aside those objections, one must be fair. The CFP's aims were sensible. They were to improve conservation so that fish stocks would increase year on year and we would have a growing and prosperous fishing industry. No one, however, could believe that the CFP has achieved any of its aims. The British industry is in a parlous state. We have an aging fleet. There is a lack of investment and we are under continual pressure from the Community to reduce the size of our fleet and our quotas.

What are the specific failures? Far from stocks increasing every year because of the CFP so that we can increase quotas progressively every year, the stocks of many species are going down. Once more, there are proposals to reduce our quotas. The Community has failed to put into operation effective technical conservation measures. How can the policy be said to conserve when thousands upon thousands of tonnes of fish—the discards—are put back into the sea dead to pollute the oceans?

As my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) said, there has been a complete failure to ban industrial fishing. There has been no attempt to deal with the growing problems of seals. The population is increasing dramatically in the North sea, with damage to salmon and to other fish stocks.

Above all, however, the policy discriminates against the UK. We provide much the largest portion of the waters of the northern seas of the European Union, yet we receive only about a quarter of the quota. May I give an example of how the restrictions affect Bridlington boats? Is it not nonsense that, in the British section of the North sea, we have virtually no quota for coley?

Coley is a large fish. Inevitably, when our fleet fishes from Bridlington for North sea cod and haddock, coley is also caught—but it has to be thrown back into the sea. For some reason, the French have a large coley quota in the North sea, in our waters, which they do not take up most years. Since I have been making this point, however, they decided to take up their quota last year. I do not know whether they are fiddling the figures.

European Union funds are given disproportionately to other European countries. I asked a parliamentary question on 21 November about how much of the fishing budget each country had received. Britain, with the largest waters, received 25 million ecu, whereas Spain received 174 million ecu and Germany—which has far smaller waters than Britain—received virtually the same. France received 37 million ecu.

Mr. Salmond rose—

Mr. Townend: If I give way, I will not be able to keep to the requested 10 minutes.

Mr. Salmond: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on what he is saying. However, is he unaware that the figures that he has just given are the result of the Government's policy of not enabling the fishing industry to have access to the very funds that he mentioned?

Mr. Townend: That does not get away from the fact that the Spaniards have been subsidised by the European Union to build boats and they have also been given the finances to buy our licences and become quota hoppers. The whole thing is absolute nonsense.

I support the Government's efforts to end quota hopping, but I only wish that the Opposition today had come out in full support of that policy and said that if they were elected at the next general election they would veto the intergovernmental conference if it did not deal with the problem of quota hopping. However, they did not say that. They never make a commitment, they just imply that they will do something. I challenge the Labour Front-Bench spokesman to give a commitment to the industry that if the Labour party is elected it will veto the IGC unless it deals with the matter.

If we are opening up the whole issue, the Government should take the opportunity at the IGC to transfer British waters back to British control under the doctrine of subsidiarity. Once the fish in our waters are British again, we can have a sensible administration for the benefit of conservation and the British fishing industry, under a coastal management scheme.

We can but compare our situation with that of Norway, which is outside the common fisheries policy. My fishermen tell me that in the Norwegian section of the North sea the cod are much bigger and there are not the same problems with discards. The Norwegian industry is prosperous; there is no shortage of money for investment.

Despite all the commitments, if we do not take the opportunity now open to us my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston will be proved to be right. In the early years of the next century—2002, I believe—foreign boats will be fishing right up to our waters and there will be equal access for everyone. That will be disastrous.

I want to raise a few points that my fishermen feel are important and which I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will deal with when he replies to the debate. The fishermen believe it absolutely vital to maintain the fisheries industry safety group. They believe that there should be minimum landing sizes. They want an improvement in the stock assessment that forms the basis of quotas. For years, they have been based on the recommendations of scientists. If they had been right, we should have been able to look forward each year to increasing stocks. The scientists have not been right and the fishermen's perspective of stock should not be ignored, as the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) said.

The fishermen want us to do everything possible to ensure that there is no cut this year in the North sea cod quota. Some 80 to 90 per cent. of my fishermen depend on cod, so a cut would be devastating for the Bridlington industry. There is also no justification for keeping down the quota for North sea haddock, which is not under the same pressure as cod, merely because it is caught in the same fisheries.

Finally, we must deal with the problem of seals—despite the view of environmentalists. The seals are reproducing at an enormous rate and it is wrong to say that they do not affect the fishing industry. I have seen salmon, caught by my fishermen, with big bites taken out of them. Seals are like foxes—they do not eat salmon, they just take big bites out of them and ruin them for the fisherman.

Having dealt with the problems of Bridlington, I want to say a word on behalf of those British fishermen who are not represented in the House. I speak, of course, of the fishermen of Guernsey, whose waters are now being pillaged by the French. The French have been breaking agreements and have had their naval fishery protection vessels supporting their fishermen in the waters off Guernsey.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Our Navy has been present.

Mr. Townend: I am pleased to hear that. Will my hon. Friend the Minister confirm that, as it is not the information that I have been given? If the Navy is there, I hope that it will take a higher profile. We should let the fishermen of Guernsey know that we are prepared to fight for their rights, just as we were prepared to fight for the rights of the Falkland islanders.

8.25 pm

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): I want to place on record my appreciation to the Minister and to Baroness Denton, the Northern Ireland Office Minister responsible for fisheries, who visited my constituency a couple of weeks ago and discussed many problems with fishing organisations and fishermen.

I want at the outset to quote from a 1992 European Commission report, "Regional Socio-Economic Studies in the Fisheries sector". It said that in Northern Ireland

"there are currently very few alternate employment opportunities. Perhaps this is the one area where the maintenance of fish and related industry employment should be a priority."

In other words, the Commission said that the Northern Ireland fishing industry is special and worthy of being given priority in its dealings under the general guidance and rules.

I raise that matter because we are talking about conservation matters. I must embellish what the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) said by citing three statistics relevant to the fishing industry in Northern Ireland. First, to date there has been a reduction of about 35 per cent. in our fishing fleet. Secondly, there has been a 25 per cent. reduction in our catches or landings. Thirdly, 200 to 300 jobs have been lost from a work force of about 2,500.

[Mr. Eddie McGrady]

I can conclude only that Northern Ireland has made a substantial, more proportional, contribution to fishing conservation in the Irish sea than anyone else. That was confirmed when, as the hon. Member for North Antrim said, we visited Brussels in the past couple of weeks, but we could still be penalised because Brussels alleges—I want the Minister to comment on this—that the United Kingdom as a whole has not fulfilled its obligations on conservation. Because Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom, it will be further penalised in the forthcoming multi-annual guidance programme IV. We will suffer disproportionately yet again, despite the fact that we have fulfilled our conservation commitment. That point needs to be made very clearly.

We were also alarmed by the proposals under Lassen for a further 40 per cent. reduction in fishing effort—a 40 per cent. reduction of a 70 per cent. remnant of the fleet of Northern Ireland. That would be devastating. There comes a point when fishing effort at sea—which, of course, supports the onshore process involving factories and jobs—simply collapses. If there are not sufficient catches coming ashore, the whole industry, both at sea and ashore, will collapse like a pack of cards.

The Lassen report has been scorned and opposed by all participating Governments, but it is the only report on the table. There is no other proposal. All the others are in the air, and we must be very careful, because Commissioner Bonino is very enamoured of it.

The quota restrictions that we think will be imposed are frightening for the Northern Ireland fishing industry. Whiting, plaice, herring and haddock have been placed in the same category. I shall deal with one of the species to illustrate our problem with all the quotas. In 1997, the Irish sea whiting total allowable catch will suffer its greatest reduction, from 9,000 tonnes in 1996. The scientific community recommended a TAC of 7,500 tonnes, but the Commission has now proposed one of 6,400—a cut of 29 per cent. We simply cannot withstand such a cut. We also do not understand it. All the signs indicate that, in 1997, the potential is good for whiting fishing.

On Irish sea whiting, the ICES scientists report stated:

"Whiting is taken mainly as a by-catch in mixed species otter trawl fisheries . . . The stock is considered to be within safe biological limits."

An interesting comparison can be made on the basis of two quotations in the same report, one on whiting in the Irish sea, the other on whiting off the west of Scotland. On the latter area, the report states:

"Whiting is mainly taken as a mixed fishery"

and

"ICES considers the stock to be within safe biological limits."

There is not a great deal of difference between the quotations about fish stocks in the different areas, yet a reduction of 2,600 tonnes has been recommended for Irish sea whiting, whereas an increase of 2,000 tonnes has been recommended for the west of Scotland.

Can someone explain that paradox? I hope that the Minister will take the point on board. I can run down the list—on whiting, haddock and herring, for example—and find similar contradictions. The cod regime will not be greatly diminished, yet we know from larval surveys that there are now three times as many cod in the Irish sea as there have been in recent years.

I was interested that the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) dealt with the unique problems faced by the Northern Ireland fishing industry. We should remember that it is a fishing industry with three ports that are very close together. It uses a common fishing ground—which is at the confluence of the two tides, north and south—that comprises a specific ecological, fishing and breeding ground. It has a speciality of its own, which, as late as 1992, was mentioned in a paper issued by the Commission.

The Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East mentioned the Hague preference. They drew certain conclusions, but they did not go far enough or draw the conclusion that I thought they could have drawn: Northern Ireland should be a top priority fishing region. There is nothing new about that conclusion. In all structural and social funds, the Northern Ireland region has a special connotation—category I. Why cannot that connotation be applied to the fishing industry? If we extrapolate the comments of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in today's statement on BSE, he was saying—or at least he was hinting at it; perhaps, once we examine the small print, it was only vote-catching for tonight's Division and not a reality—or insinuating that Northern Ireland will be a special region in relation to BSE and to lifting the ban, because it has fulfilled the Florence conditions.

Northern Ireland has a specific, coastal-fishing fishing industry. It forms a specific sector, and it has specific fishing grounds. In his speech today, the Minister said that different waters require different conservation measures. I shall take him at his word and ask him to apply other considerations to conservation measures in the Northern Irish fishing industry.

If I am still within my time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to deal with the issue of the Hague preference vis-à-vis the Republic of Ireland. Hon. Members' comments on that matter in today's debate have been correct. There is a surplus in the Republic of Ireland's quota for some species under the Hague preference, whereas there is a shortfall in the UK's allocation in Northern Ireland waters. Over the years, there has been a unilateral arrangement by which the adverse effects of the Hague preference have been diminished and alleviated by the Republic of Ireland swapping its surplus to meet the requirements of the Northern Ireland fishing industry.

I think that that arrangement should operate on a more regulated basis, rather than using the ad hoc-ery of past years. I ask the Minister to raise that issue with his counterpart in the Republic of Ireland, and to conduct a small re-arrangement of the Hague preference to alleviate its adverse effects on Northern Ireland.

Despite the assurances given to us today that the Minister is going hell for leather against the Hague preference, he told me recently—in a letter of 12 December 1996—that it was not in the interests of the United Kingdom fishing industry to deal with the Hague preference now. That is a very different message from that which he gave the House today.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): In his opening speech, my hon. Friend the Minister said that I had expressed my concerns about the six and 12-mile limits. Although that is true, I should tell the House that those concerns pale into insignificance compared with my concern about the regime that we are now debating. There is no doubt that the common fisheries regime is both evil and corrupting. It is evil because of its devastating effect on the marine environment; it is corrupting because, among other things, it obliges otherwise honest men to become criminals.

That fact is well demonstrated by the words spoken in court by a Shetland fisherman, as reported in the Fishing News of 13 December 1996. He said:

"We can't help what we catch . . . I had dumped 400 boxes of saithe . . . Who has committed the biggest crime—me, who landed 25 boxes, or a system which made me dump 400 boxes?"

That is why I say that the regime is totally unacceptable.

The problem of discards and quotas is well known; perhaps less well known is the amount of fish that is destroyed onshore. In Peterhead harbour in June, and in Scalloway harbour in the Shetlands in August, colleagues and I saw prime fresh fish covered with red paint which was to be destroyed because it did not fetch the minimum landing price decreed by the European Community. How can we possibly claim that such policies—all of which were introduced in the name of conservation—are having their intended effect when thousands upon thousands of tonnes of fish are dumped at sea and when prime fresh fish is being destroyed ashore?

The common fisheries policy is not a practical policy. On the contrary, it is a political policy in which a vital British national interest is subjugated in the quest for European hegemony. It offends against common sense; it lacks credibility and any notion of morality; and its only principle—that of European integration—is one that I and thousands of fishermen cannot possibly support.

The principle that I do support is that of defending a vital national interest. I respectfully suggest that the Government should not talk about national interests unless they are prepared to defend them, which they are at present failing to do in British waters around Guernsey where the perception is that the United Kingdom has not deployed the Royal Navy for fear of upsetting the French.

I met Guernsey fishermen in the Palace of Westminster last Thursday. They complained of harassment, intimidation, blackmail and of being set up for prosecution, all of which the Government have apparently not seen fit to counter. My hon. Friend the Minister has repeatedly stated that the six and 12-mile limits are not negotiable. Will he therefore tell the House why armed French naval vessels of the Affaires Maritimes have sailed into the six to 12-mile limits off Guernsey in support of French fishing vessels?

I deal now with some other aspects of the common fisheries policy. The House must not portray Jacques Santer, Emma Bonino and the other Commissioners as bogeymen and women; we should see them for what they are—Commissioners of the European Union, spelling out, often with disarming honesty and clarity, what we in the United Kingdom have already signed up to in three solemn and binding treaties leading inexorably to European integration.

I should like to say a word or two about fishing permits. In answer to a parliamentary question, my hon. Friend the Minister said:

"Council regulations 3760/92 and 1627/94 provide the framework for the Community's licensing and permit systems to enable member states to regulate fishing activities . . . They do not entail a European fleet run from Brussels."—[Official Report, 11 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 73.]

I have just two points to make about that. First, the permits represent days at sea by another name. Secondly, they are aspects of European policy, and while member states may administer them, they will do so only as the designated agent of the central authority in Brussels. As I shall show in a moment, neither the UK nor any other member state of the European Community has competence in these matters.

I do not argue with the basic premise of permits. If one accepts the principle of a common fisheries policy, a permit system is entirely logical, but neither I nor a substantial—and growing—number of people in the fishing industry any longer want a common fisheries policy. I support the aims and objectives of the Save Britain's Fish campaign. I support the repatriation of powers and the establishment of a 200-mile exclusive fishing zone for this country.

The common fisheries policy is fundamentally flawed and quite incapable of sensible reform. On that point, we should perhaps remind ourselves of the words of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. In a press release dated February 1995, he said:

"There is no prospect of a unanimous agreement among the 15 Member States to amend the Treaties which provide the legal basis of the CFP . . . The fact is that the UK has accepted, by Treaty, that Fisheries lie within the competence of the European Community".

The principle of equal access and the prospect of the permit system is wholly unacceptable both to this nation, which recognises it as a loss of sovereignty, and to the fishing industry, which sees it as a sell-out of British waters and as a giving away of the substantial fish stocks in them, not to mention the livelihood of British fishermen.

As for the immediate import of this debate, we shall soon vote on these important issues. I repeat now what I have said on previous occasions: this vote, whether the Government win or lose, will not change one jot or tittle of the common fisheries policy. It is quite bogus and, to use the phrase of my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), it is humbug for the Opposition parties to pretend that they have grounds for opposing the Government tonight.

When I intervened on him, the Opposition spokesman confirmed what we have long known—that the Labour party is committed to the common fisheries policy. It is committed to the principle of equal access to the common resource. Unless it changes its mind on that question, it has no locus to criticise or vote against what the Government are trying to do. The reality is that even if Labour were to form the Government tomorrow, it would still be bound by the common fisheries policy.

To conclude, I remind hon. Members of the extent of the House's power over fisheries policy. In a letter dated 19 June 1996, J. Almeida Serra of the Fisheries Directorate General XIV, said:

"Member States have transferred exclusive competence to the community with regard to the conservation and management of living marine resources. This competence applies in regard to waters under national fisheries jurisdiction and to the high seas."

[Mr. Christopher Gill]

I say again that it is bogus for the Opposition parties to pretend that they could have any policy other than the common fisheries policy unless and until that policy is scrapped.

8.46 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): If the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) will forgive me, I have to say that it is his argument that is bogus and humbug. He made a case for not supporting the Labour party's amendment; he most certainly does not have an argument for supporting the Government, which is what he said he was going to do.

People in the fishing industry will hear that the Eurosceptics, who say that they support the industry, are now going to support the Government. Those people will cast their minds back to the voting behaviour of some of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues during the days-at-sea controversy, for example, where again those hon. Members' support for the fishing industry and opposition to the Government were found wanting. The hon. Member for Ludlow may quarrel with the Labour party, with me and with the Liberal party, but according to the argument that he has advanced he does not have a shred of credibility if he is not prepared to oppose the Government.

The Minister said that he disliked the Scottish National party. I am afraid that that does not cause me any anxiety whatsoever. I have to tell him that the fishing industry dislikes the Government. It dislikes the Government not because of the 10-point plan that the Minister has introduced, but because of the past 10 years of inaction and failure to defend the industry's interests. The broken water of the do-nothing years, as one of the fishing industry's leaders so memorably put it only a while ago, is the reason why the fishing industry does not trust the Government.

There is no doubt that the Labour party's amendment is flawed, but it has the virtue of going over the record of the past 17 years and detailing some of the failures, the betrayals and the sell-outs in which the Government have engaged vis-à-vis the fishing industry. It would be enormously helpful if the Labour party would discuss its amendment with the other six Opposition parties, all of which have an interest in the fishing industry. It would not only be useful for the Labour party to show some humility in recognising that every Opposition party vote is necessary to defeat the Government, but the combined wisdom of the Social Democratic and Labour party, the Unionist parties, the Liberals and the Scottish National party might improve Labour's amendment. Judging from its document charting the road to the manifesto, which does not mention the subject, the Labour party's commitment to the fishing industry is minimal. Nevertheless, the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru will support the Labour amendment and, if it comes to a vote, will oppose the Government motion as an indictment of the Government's track record on the industry.

I want to raise three specific fishing issues with the Under–Secretary of State for Scotland before turning to some more general points. First, I reinforce the point made about sprat by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). There is a difficulty with the by-catch in the pelagic sector. I hope that the Minister will deal with that when he sums up.

Secondly, on the haddock quota on the west coast and in the North sea, it is vital to contest the argument that because the area is a mixed fishery, if there is a decline in the cod quota, the haddock quota must also decline. We can still have a clean fishery for haddock in a mixed fishery. On the west coast, cod fishing takes place in February, March and April and not in the rest of the year. It does not follow that haddock and cod quotas should go down in sequence. I hope that the Minister will assure us that he will devote the same amount of energy to the haddock quota in the North sea as was devoted to the plaice quota last year and that the decline of the haddock quota on the west coast will be visited before the final decisions are made.

Thirdly, I want to raise the issue of the Hague preference. I want at least one voice this evening to speak in support of the Hague preference, which is important for the Scottish industry. I hope that that will be acknowledged by the Under–Secretary of State for Scotland when he sums up. The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who introduced the debate, told us that all the fishing representatives had agreed that the Hague preference should be reconsidered. I consulted the Scottish Fishermen's Federation and found that it had not agreed; it had just been told that the issue would be reconsidered. The Minister then told us that the representatives had not agreed, but they had not objected when he had told them. He then told us—the record will confirm this—that there were differing views across the United Kingdom.

As a Member of Parliament representing Scottish fishermen, I shall obviously defend the Hague preference because it has played an important role in defending the Scottish fishing industry, particularly the haddock quota. However, one point about the Hague preference should not go unsaid. Negotiated in the mid-1970s by Garret Fitzgerald, then Irish Foreign Minister, it is the one part of the common fisheries policy that relates to fishing dependency. It may do that imperfectly, but that is a valuable principle to defend. Apart from the point that Ireland's great success in formulating and defending the Hague preference shows how a small nation in Europe can gain results by making one issue a priority, the Hague preference is worth defending in principle. I have a little advice for Labour Front Benchers. Perhaps they should address the concerns of hon. Members from Northern Ireland by saying that their interests will be defended in the swaps arrangements and that, unlike last year, the commitments will be delivered this year, whatever party is in power.

I come now to the issues at the heart of the problems with the common fisheries policy. I remind the fisheries Minister who opened the debate that I have been criticising the common fisheries policy since long before he became the Minister responsible for fisheries. Having seen fisheries Ministers come and go with depressing regularity, I fully expect to be criticising it long after he has stopped being the Minister.

The Government wonder why I doubt their commitment on flags of convenience. It is partly because of their record. Back in 1988, the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and I argued in Committee on the Merchant Shipping Bill that the Government's measures were likely to fail in the European Court and we put forward an alternative proposal for residential requirements for the crews of such vessels.

The Government told us that such a measure was silly and unnecessary. It was clearly not unnecessary and a residential requirement on the crew would have been more logical than imposing a language requirement, which seems to be the Minister's latest idea.

My real concern about flags of convenience vessels relates to the Government's recent record. I refer to the challenge made by my hon. Friend the Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) to the President of the Board of Trade on 12 November, when he made a statement on the Government's objections to the 48-hour directive. My hon. Friend said:

"Despite its flexibility, the time scale for implementation and the existing derogations, will that issue now take priority over discussions about matters such as the common fisheries policy . . . ?"

The President of the Board of Trade replied:

"There are other important issues to be addressed at the intergovernmental conference, but it is this issue"— the 48-hour directive—

"that matters to the Government and we intend to insist upon it."—[Official Report, 12 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 163.]

I do not think that it is unfair for me to ask the Government what would happen if agreement were reached on flags of convenience vessels but not on the 48-hour directive. Would the Government block their own achievement on fishing in pursuit of their opposition to the 48-hour directive? As the Amsterdam summit comes conveniently after the general election, the question can also be addressed to those on the Labour Front Bench. Presumably they can apply their minds directly to flags of convenience vessels because they do not oppose the 48-hour directive. After so many years of betrayal, we are entitled to ask about the priority being given to this long-running sore for the fishing industry.

My second issue is relative stability. That is the rock on which the common fisheries policy becomes tolerable or intolerable. Many of us had our confidence in the future of the policy severely damaged when the Government—together with other Governments—conceded early access to western waters for the Spanish. That was a staggering achievement by the Spanish. They had to revisit and reinterpret their treaty of accession, achieve unanimity across all member states and win legal opinion. Having started with indefensible arguments, the Spanish managed to achieve early access against all the odds because they had it as a top priority.

The European Parliament fisheries committee elected as its rapporteur Ms Carmen Fraga Estevez—a Spanish Member of the European Parliament who is known to be a hard-line supporter of free access to all fisheries. That is depressing for the future of the policy. The House may be interested to learn that the British Conservatives in the European Parliament were among her sponsors for that post: they put forward a hard-line Spanish federalist as rapporteur for that crucial fisheries committee. It is little wonder the fishing industry has scant confidence in many of the Conservative party's statements.

My last general point is on low quotas. More than any other issue, the idiocy of having to throw back dead into the sea perfectly good fish has undermined confidence on the quayside in the common fisheries policy. At a certain point, the low quota policy starts to work in a perverse direction.

The ideas that have come from the industry of a tax on industrial fishing and technical measures to defend the industry have not been pursued with the urgency that is required. The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland may frown—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): What tripe!

Mr. Salmond: Tripe, is it? I saw more action after the Government's defeat last year in the fisheries debate than I had seen in my previous eight years in the House. Nothing has concentrated the Government's mind more wonderfully than being defeated in the House last year. We have had 30 points from the fisheries review group and a 10-point plan from the Minister. Why? Fishing has at last become a key political issue because the Government know that they face defeat in the Chamber. It is the prospect of defeat that has concentrated the Government's mind. It is the prospect of defeat that has stopped fishing being traded off, as it has so often been before, in pursuit of other objectives.

The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland will pardon us if, as Members who represent fishing constituencies, we look for a time when it will not require the imminence of political defeat in the House of Commons to concentrate the Government's mind on the fishing industry. We want a Government who concentrate on fishing full time, all the time. In my opinion, that means a Scottish Government.

8.59 pm

Mr. David Porter (Waveney): Every year, we have this pre-quota debate on fisheries, and every year we face huge cuts in the quota, the fleet or both. Every year the Minister, like his predecessors, goes off to Europe and returns waving a piece of paper and saying, "The cuts are less than first thought: that must be a triumph." Every year, in spite of and because of this ritual, the fleet gets smaller and the job gets harder.

Visitors to Lowestoft fish market are often shocked at the low level of activity when they have heard from people who recall walking from deck to deck across the harbour not so many years ago. The fishing boats were wedged in because there were so many of them. Anyone who looks at what is happening is shocked. Even those of us who have watched it happening are shocked at what has been done. The industry has not been calling wolf all these years. The warnings have been sounded and now we really are at the point of no return in so many aspects of fishing.

It is bad enough that coastal communities are being devastated, but the biggest tragedy of all is that fishing, managed properly, is a renewable resource. If gas, oil or coal is harvested to extinction, that is it and everybody understands that, but if fishing is wiped out, it is a failure of the regime that regulates it. The CFP and all that is done in its name is that regime. It is a monument to the nightmare world of bureaucracy where, in pursuit of a misguided ideal of a common European policy for something as diverse and varied as the whole European fishery, a British industry is in danger of being sacrificed. Everything comes back to that policy.

If cuts and restrictions to save the industry were being presented now as a make-or-break deal, the industry would accept them. It might have accepted this year's proposed cuts—for example, 48 per cent. in North sea sole against the background of the best sole fishery in living memory. However, cuts happen every year; there are more cuts every year because the previous year's cuts have failed.

I am encouraged—vindicated even—to find that no one now defends the CFP, although not enough people are yet arguing for our removal from it. As has been said, and as needs to be said again and again, the CFP is flawed from top to bottom. There is no incentive in it to conserve and manage the renewable resource because any savings in catch effort go back into the pool for the greedy Mediterranean fishermen to grab. There is the added problem in terms of conservation, which was mentioned earlier, of discarding dead fish over and above quota. Can there be a more bizarre, crazy and ludicrous political idea than the CFP, which does the precise opposite of what is intended?

Every year, more and more people are waking up to this madness. As the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) has said, fishing has risen up the political agenda. This year, the Government have given almost a full day to the debate, which is very welcome. Every year, the media get into a frenzy about the chances of the Government being defeated. Last year, the Government were defeated; I abstained on that occasion, although I had voted against the Government previously.

The point is that defeat made no difference. The Minister still went off to Europe, still spent a weekend arguing with our alleged partners and still came back with permission to catch fewer British fish than before. If the Government are defeated tonight, it will again make no difference at all. The Minister will still go off and the 1997 quotas will still be set. Tonight I shall vote with the Government: the time to vote against is afterwards, when the Minister comes back with a deal that is too poor to accept.

Furthermore—[Interruption.] Labour Front-Bench Members laugh. Furthermore, to vote against the Government means voting with the Opposition, and their views on fisheries policy are muddled at best, as we heard from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang). I cannot stomach voting tonight with a party that has said that it will never be isolated in Europe and whose leader has ruled out leaving the CFP.

In addition, my hon. Friend the Minister has made a lot of the right noises. He has visited and made himself available to the industry around the country. He has understood the essential problems of trying to run an industry by agreement with other countries whose market tastes, cultural attitudes to rules and political agendas are all totally alien to ours.

The Minister has talked about and promised action on quota hoppers and he is looking at the regional management of separate waters. A dose of benefit of the doubt is due in the Division Lobby tonight. However, the Minister knows, as we all know, that talk of the reform of the CFP and of there being no IGC agreement until details such as quota hoppers and flagship piracy are sorted may be a further part of the con.

The future after the year 2002 is surely already settled. The treaties and regulations now in place and those that will be enforced if no new deals are stitched up in or before 2002 can be amended only by unanimous agreement. Only a fool would pretend that some European Union member states will vote away their only justification for access to our waters. Even under qualified majority voting, they can hold us to a policy which, increasingly, is in their interests.

If and when more countries enter the bizarre lunacy of the European Union for no other reason than that they will get something out of it at our expense, our position will become worse. We shall have little or no fishing grounds as large fleets are allowed access in return for a slice of equal access to the common resource, which appears to be open to every Tom, Dick and Harry except, of course, the British.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) referred to the European Union special fishing permit. It is based on the 1976 article setting out the CFP, which introduced the repulsive Soviet-style principle of equal access to a common resource. It gives Brussels ultimate power to control numbers of vessels, fishing times, catches and mesh and gear sizes and types. It also sets out fines, including seizure and withdrawal of permits.

The Commission tried to introduce the permit system during the negotiations on Spanish accession to the EU, but it was opposed. When Finland and Sweden joined, they were obliged to sign a treaty to the effect that access arrangements would apply for a transitional period ending by the date of implementation of the Community fishing permit system—not later than 31 December 2002. Treaties must be agreed unanimously, so all Governments of member states knew about the permit system and agreed to it. That leads me to ask whether talk of reform is a cover and whether a single Brussels-controlled fleet has not already been agreed for 2002 or 2003.

I wish my hon. Friend the Minister luck at the Council of Ministers meeting. Let him go to Europe and argue for the British fishing industry, which he knows is in a bad way. Let him go, knowing that that industry could have a bright future with good, lasting jobs and a steady supply of wholesome food. However, if he cuts the quotas or reduces the fleet at Lowestoft any further through the ludicrous decommissioning scheme, which compensates boat owners but not those who are put on the dole when the boats are scrapped, or if the cuts are greater than those of previous years, there will be no fishing left. At Lowestoft, a 40 per cent. cut could mean a 100 per cent. cut because the remaining 60 per cent. would not be viable.

If my hon. Friend has to come back with a deal that includes cuts, he should not come back. If he has to sell us out to get a deal, he should not come back. Our European partners need us more than we need them. We are answerable to the people of the United Kingdom and not the European Union.

9.6 pm

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): When I first saw today's Order Paper, I was greatly cheered. We all thought that we would have a full day's debate, but when we arrived here, we realised that there were two long statements. No less than one hour and 55 minutes disappeared, so we have ended up with little more than the half day that we had last year for one of the most important debates of the year on a topic that is vital to the welfare of fishing communities throughout the United Kingdom. That is not acceptable. We really need a full day's debate, so that those of us who speak at the tail end of the debate can expand on the issues before us. We all have problems to relate, and if the debate were longer, no doubt other hon. Members would contribute to it.

Reference has been made to quota hopping. When we first entered the quota system, I wonder why nobody had the wit to ring-fence fish quotas in the same way as we ring-fence milk quotas and sheep quotas—which are distributed among the four countries of the United Kingdom and, for sheep, between lowland and upland flocks. If that had been done, we would not be facing the current problems with quota hopping. We are in our current predicament simply because there was not enough forethought when we put our name to the policy in the past.

When I examine the position in Northern Ireland, I am absolutely astonished to find that the Northern Ireland quota has reduced while that of the Irish Republic has increased. In last year's debate, the Minister said:

"I assure hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies that I shall be pressing the Fisheries Council for increases in the quotas proposed for the Irish sea. We fully appreciate the concerns of the Northern Irish industry about the Hague preference and of course we shall continue to seek to reduce the disadvantage to Northern Ireland resulting from the Hague preference"— which, of course, has the opposite effect on Scotland—

"by carrying out international quota swaps."—[Official Report, 19 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1398-99.]

However, that never materialised.

I was told by the Minister in a letter on 12 December:

"These frustrations arise not because of the action by the UK in applying Hague Preference, but because of the approach taken by the Republic and I will be taking this up again with the Irish Minister at the December Fisheries Council."

I hope that he will take it up with a great deal more success this year than was the case last year, when we got nowt, which was not much help to the fishermen in Northern Ireland.

We are all disappointed that the swaps that the Minister promised last year did not materialise. Towards the end of the fishing season, we pretty well ran out of whiting. Some were eventually procured from elsewhere, but that had more to do with good fortune than with Government action.

Although I welcome the Minister's remarks today about the Hague preference and revisiting, more needs to be done than that. Inequities must be resolved, but not at the expense of Scottish fishermen. Many communities in Scotland depend on fishing and would disappear if it is not kept up to scratch. Similarly, there are communities in Northern Ireland that are entirely dependent on fishing. We must realise that there is no alternative for those folk.

It would be a great blessing and enlightenment to us all if the Hague preference was published, as well as the appendices to it which, I believe, were never signed. We should all like to read them and see what we signed up to, or put our hand to.

The fish stocks of cod, herring, whiting and haddock in the Irish sea are in good shape or better. In the case of cod, there has been a reduction in fishing effort, which might account for the decrease in landings. Herring and whiting stocks seem to fishermen to be adequate; fishermen and scientists are often at variance. Whiting stocks, like those in the west of Scotland, are combined with other fish. Many of us cannot understand why that should be so. They should be treated as a distinct fishery, which they are.

At one time, haddock were scarce in the Irish sea. There is now a haddock stock off the coast of Down, and there is evidence that they are spawning there. I hope that that reflects the attitude of the Northern Ireland fishermen towards conservation, and the gear that they use. Those fish, however, are not being caught; we are not allowed to catch them, because area VIIa of the Irish sea is part of the larger area VII, which extends far beyond the confines of the Irish sea. Although haddock are scarce in the overall area, they are locally abundant. Surely it is time that we considered carefully a more localised fishing policy to deal with the changes over the years in the abundance or scarcity of particular species of fish.

Scientists often seem to get matters wrong. Would it not be a good idea for them to go out on the fishing boats, so that they could see what the fishermen are catching, and whether fish are abundant or scarce, rather than the scientists being taken round once or twice a year to take quick samples here and there? In theory, that could be accurate, but to be sure of accuracy, scientists should make many more stops than they can under the present system. If they were out on the boats, as they used to be, we would have a more accurate idea of stocks.

There is one topic concerning fishermen that has not been mentioned: the way in which the jobseeker's allowance impacts on fishermen. I hope that the Minister will take up the matter with the Secretary of State for Social Security. The JSA is not designed for the fishermen's life style. The scheme is for people who are out of work, but fishermen are not out of work. Their work is simply intermittent, and their working days are not foreseeable. When they go into the local office to make a claim, they are told that they can have an appointment in a couple of weeks' time. In two weeks' time, they might be fishing and they cannot go. It is an important matter, and I hope that the Minister will undertake to do something about it.

We have heard much about the Government's demerits. We have heard remarkably little about the Opposition's policy, and rather more about their hopes. As the real debate will take place in a month or six weeks, it might be as well to see the outcome of that before we make up our mind on our attitude to the Government.

9.14 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): In view of the shortness of time, I thought that I would have to resort to the formula of saying that I would not be able to follow what the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) said and the way in which he said it, but he touched on the Opposition's policy, and, as they were unable to say anything about it, it seemed only fair, in the spirit of bipartisanship, to comment on it, and perhaps help out the hon. Gentleman.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have either sparingly deposited or positively heaped praised on my hon. Friend the Minister of State, for the way in which he has performed over the past year, which is entirely right. What he has achieved has been quite remarkable. I have certainly noticed a difference in the perception and understanding of fishermen who have spoken to me of what the Government are trying to do for them.

[Mr. Patrick Nicholls]

The unhappiness that always underpins fisheries debates underpins the debate again today. The problem is that the Minister can swim only in the water in which he finds himself. The water in which he is swimming at the moment is that of the common fisheries policy. At first sight, it is easy to say that the CFP is dreadful, we should get out of it and some other policy out there would be so much better. I do not think that that is easy to say. The CFP is only a symptom of something that is very bad indeed; it is telling us something about the European Community's very nature.

It is all too easy to deride people with views such as mine and say, "Hang on a second. What you are really talking about is withdrawing from the European Community." I am proposing no such thing. There is no question of our being able to withdraw from Europe—a million war dead from two world wars testify to the fact that the fate of the Government and the country is inextricably tied up with Europe. The argument is about not whether we pull out of Europe, but the terms on which we participate in Europe.

Among other things, the debate illustrates that, after 25 years in Europe on the terms that we have had—and have—in Europe, we must ask ourselves whether they are the right terms for our continuing participation in Europe. It seems to me that they are not. One has only to look at the CFP and the circumstances in which the Minister must try to defend British interests to know that this business of the European Union as it is now constructed simply cannot go on. I hope that one day—not tonight, but perhaps some time in the not too distant future—the British Government will say to the EU, "You have aspirations about your destiny and a desire for political union and federation that make perfect and honourable sense, given your history, but they are not for us."

We have to find a relationship with Europe that makes us good Europeans—I perhaps speak just for myself—instead of bad Europeans. We cannot for ever keep on asking our so-called partners in Europe to do things our way when, universally, they want to do things their way. There will come a point when we shall have to ask our European partners, "What can we honestly and genuinely agree and co-operate on?" In my judgment, we shall agree on a trading arrangement, which will carry with it a number of features. Those features will include taking back our own destiny, making our own decisions, taking back our territorial waters and rejecting for ever the concept that, in some way, our resources are a common EU resource.

Although I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench on their excellent attitude over the past year and although I have been heartened by what they have said about quota hopping, to which I shall return, I have to strike a sombre note. There is a limit to what they can do in Europe with a common fisheries policy while we are hobbled to the EU in such a way.

If time allowed, I would go through all the aspects that have been raised by my local fishing people throughout the year and set out what they would ideally like. In order that my hon. Friend the Minister takes note, I should simply mention that the total allowable catch of monkfish is of particular concern in the west country.

On quota hopping, one has only to look at the figures supplied by the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations to realise what an outrage is being perpetrated on fishing people at the moment. The Dutch hold 44 per cent. of the UK's plaice quota and 20 per cent. of the UK's sole quota. The Spanish—for crying out loud—hold 46 per cent. of the UK's hake quota, 35 per cent. of our megrim quota and 29 per cent. of our monkfish quota. Those figures, and the situations that they represent, must stop.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Does my hon. Friend, who is my neighbour in Devon, agree that quota hopping is precisely the issue at the heart of all the complaints that we receive from fishermen in the south-west? Does he also agree that that has been recognised by the Government in their refusal to sign any further Maastricht treaty without having reached an accommodation on that crucial issue?

Mr. Nicholls: My hon. Friend is right. He is saying on the Floor of the House precisely what he and I have said to each other and on delegations to Ministers over many years. Quota hopping is the key point in the unsatisfactory nature of the current situation. Because we are locked into the European Union, to get some reform, we shall have to threaten to shake down the temple. That is essentially what Ministers are saying that they intend to do.

Inevitably, some people outside will say that politics is a matter of choice. Many people think that politics is a choice between the bad and the frightful; obviously I do not accept that. There must be people who are concerned about the fishing industry and have been watching this debate who have said, "What's on offer? There's going to be an election soon. Perhaps we should have a look at the other parties' policies."

It is completely in a spirit of friendship that I say to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) that his speech was truly frightful. I am glad that he has come back so as not to miss the words of praise that I am about to heap on him.

The hon. Gentleman's speech was frightful, not because he lacks forensic debating skills—I know from our past exchanges that he is endowed with those—but because he is too honest. It was impossible for him, with the brief that he had, to make a fist of supporting the proposition that the Labour party had anything constructive to say about its policy. Over and over again, he failed to talk about policy. Perfectly correctly, he refused to give way to me when I wanted to chide him about some of what he had said about Labour party policy in the past. He did not want to know, and he was perfectly right.

At one point, a look of horror spread over the hon. Gentleman's face and he asked what the Government were doing in 1991 and 1992. In 1992, the hon. Gentleman was fighting on a Labour manifesto that contained not a single word about the fishing industry. Not long afterwards, the European elections were fought. What did the Labour party say about fishing then? Absolutely nothing.

To be fair, even the Labour party can learn. It has now published a document called, "New Labour, New Life for Britain", which contains a statement about fish: it is one word shorter than the title of the document. It is no wonder that the hon. Gentleman did not want to give way on his policy, because he does not have one that he can honestly state and, being the decent chap that he is, he was not prepared to pretend that he had.

The reality is that the hon. Gentleman is wedded hook, line and sinker to the common fisheries policy because he is a federalist. I do not know whether he genuinely believes in that and feels more comfortable as an arch-federalist in an arch-federalist party than he did in all the previous general elections that he fought as someone who wanted to come out of the Community, but the fact is that he is hooked, because Labour is in favour of a federal Europe, and policies such as the common fisheries policy are the inevitable consequence of that.

To try to attract people to the prospect of voting Labour because it might have a good fisheries policy, all that the hon. Gentleman can say is that he will put up with the status quo, that he will never be isolated in Europe and that he will abandon the veto. That is the sum total of the Labour party's policy on fishing. To put it as kindly as one can, that is not an attractive prospect.

The Liberal party will have a policy for every season. I tried to find out what the Liberal policy on fishing was. I was none the wiser for listening to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

Mr. Wallace: It is in our document.

Mr. Nicholls: It is impressive to learn that the hon. Gentleman went away to find out for himself what Liberal policy was. Apparently, the Liberal Democrats believe in establishing a European fishing fleet managed by EU regional executives. That will terrify our partners in Europe about the desire and intent of the Liberal party to—

Mr. Wallace: Rubbish.

Mr. Nicholls: It is rubbish, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for being prepared to admit that fact. What could one expect? The Liberal party does not have many principles that have not changed over the years, but the one principle of which it has always been in favour is a united states of Europe. After all, every Liberal parliamentary candidate will stick a commitment in his manifesto to the effect that, in any circumstances, the Liberals will opt for a European currency. What else on earth could one expect from a party that says that it has only one principle that matters to it—a united states of Europe? When a party has such a federalist agenda, it cannot possibly stand up for British fishermen.

What is the significance of tonight's vote? When our Ministers go to Europe to argue in the thoroughly unsatisfactory climate created by the common fisheries policy, it would be nice if they could argue with their opposite numbers and say, "Whatever else disunites us in the House of Commons, everyone is with us on this. We have certain irreducible demands." If the vote goes the wrong way, or, frankly, even if we win it narrowly, Ministers will be unable to say that. Out there, when my hon. Friends are negotiating with their opposite numbers in Europe, those European Ministers will have a sneaking suspicion that the Labour party does not have the resolve to stand up to them. They will say to themselves, "There is a general election coming along soon. Perhaps the Labour party will win. Well, we can see what the Labour party is like. It did not back the Government even on something such as this. We know that it will be a pushover." That is the problem we face.

It was put better than I can certainly put it by the Western Morning News, not a newspaper from which I am usually able to quote with approbation in the House. It is a stern critic, at times perhaps fairly so. It issued an editorial today under the heading, "Don't Sabotage Fishing Industry". It called for the industry to remain non-political and asked for unity in British interests. It said:

> "Defeat would send the wrong signals to European leaders on this crucial issue—and weaken John Major's hand in fighting for a better deal for our fishermen."

Ministers have said that they will stand up for the key issue that matters more than anything else to our fishing communities. They have said that they simply will not tolerate the continuance of the present practice of quota hopping. If we presented a united voice tonight, and if the Opposition said, "Whatever else disunites us, we will back the Government on this," what a marvellous bargaining position that would be for my hon. Friends. Instead, when my hon. Friends go to Europe next, they will be looking at their opposite numbers, who believe that a Labour victory is possible. They know that if that happens, they will have to do business with people who will ultimately sell this country's rights down the river. That is a pretty sombre prospect. That is why we should win the vote, and win the general election in six months' time.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): It is time to get back to reality after the fantasy world presented by the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls).

It is true that this annual debate has had a higher profile in recent years than it had in the past. Of course that is not all to do with the fishing industry, but the narrow votes on the issue in the past couple of years have been far from damaging for the fishing industry. They have benefited it in all sorts of ways. The Minister offered us a grand tour of the fishing constituencies and uttered warm words about the Members who represent them. In fact, he uttered such words about Members who were not even here for the debate, including the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe).

In the past we have witnessed increases in decommissioning grants; the reinstatement of port improvement grants; and tonight we have been offered more promises of fish for the Ulster fishing fleets. It is not clear from the Minister's contribution, however, from where exactly the fish will come. Of course we are all delighted about an extra allocation for the Ulster fleets, or any other fleet, but we would appreciate some details about where those fish will come from and how the transfers will be made. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), will deal with that when he replies to the debate, because I am sure that I am not the only person who is curious about it.

I should also like the hon. Gentleman to deal with the point raised by the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) and his hon. Friends about the Hague preference. Let me be absolutely straight and honest about it—it is important to start how we intend to go on in our future relationship. Of course, as the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) said, it was introduced by a Labour Minister. At the time it was welcomed by the industry because it gave the United Kingdom fishing industry an extra allocation of fish as a fallback when quotas were being pressed. In that respect it provided the industry with a safety net.

I have consistently argued that the Hague preference has its disadvantages, and the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) may remember challenging me in Committee on this matter. At that time, I expressed concerns about the fact that the Hague preference operates against the interests of the Ulster fleet and some of the fleets from the east coast of England. As an hon. Member who represents a Humberside constituency, I understand the concerns of the Humber ports and the east coast fleet. But while recognising the disadvantages, the Labour party has always conceded that the Hague preference provides a safety net and we must look at the interests of the whole country. Having said that, we recognise that the calculations for the Hague preference are not working in the best interests of our country overall, and the Minister alluded to that. That is something that needs to be considered.

We have always argued in the past that, in terms of the quota round and TACs, the Minister should wherever possible argue for quotas that do not trigger the Hague preference because it can work against the Irish fleet. It can be a two-edged sword. In the longer term, we welcome the report from the working group on CFP reform, which has put forward some interesting arguments about more autonomy in coastal state management and regional management. That is very much in line with the approach that Labour has taken. We recognise the interests of the regions, and we aim to represent the interests of all the fleets and their own particular regional issues. We can look at that, but it must be debated in the context of the reform of the CFP.

The Government motion tonight is significant not for what it says, but for what it does not say. First, I wish to refer to the TAC details, some of which have been touched on in the debate. We have heard concerns about the details, and I know that the Minister is aware of the views of the industry on the matter. There is concern about the way in which the west coast cod and haddock quotas have been linked together to protect cod, as it is felt that the science—particularly on the west coast—is not as sound as it could be. I very much hope that the Minister will press the Commission on this point.

There has been a large cut in the whiting TAC in the Irish sea of 29 per cent. It seems difficult to justify a cut of that size, and I hope that the Minister will press that matter. There is a strong argument in favour of maintaining the North sea plaice TAC at the same level, and I am sure that the Minister is aware of that. There also has been a large cut in the sole quota, which will have severe effects on the fleet. We recognise that difficult decisions have to be made on the basis of good science, but I hope that that large cut can be justified.

Mr. Salmond: I do not wish to refer to the Hague preference, as the hon. Gentleman knows my views on it. Does he take on board the view of a number of Members of other parties that it would have been useful and constructive if the other six Opposition parties had seen the Labour amendment and had had an opportunity to contribute some ideas to it?

Mr. Morley: As a general principle, I believe in that, but the hon. Gentleman may not know that the Government did not table their motion until last Friday. Therefore, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) only had last Friday to formulate an amendment, which had to be tabled then for today's debate. It was not possible in that time to contact other parties, but it is something to bear in mind for the future.

I very much welcome the fact that the industry has questioned why there should not be a cut in the TAC for sprats. If there has been a cut in the TAC for herring, it follows that there is some logic in reducing the sprat quota. That is also linked with the argument about industrial fishing in the North sea—the one issue on which there has been almost unanimous agreement tonight. Along with Members from all parties, I attended the launch of a report supported by Unilever which identified the problems of the impact of industrial fishing on the biomass in the North sea, and on the relationship between sand-eels as a prey item for commercial fish and marine mammals and marine birds.

The Minister mentioned the possibility of TACs on sand-eels and that is welcome, but the provisional figures that I have seen suggest that those TACs would be very high indeed and I am not sure that they would significantly reduce the impact of industrial fishery. It would be more logical to follow the report's recommendation, which is closing certain areas to industrial fishing on a precautionary principle. I hope that the Minister will give sympathetic thought to that proposal.

Other quotas need careful examination and, in addition, there is the issue of so-called banking and borrowing, with which the Minister will be familiar. The United Kingdom and its fishing industry have a good record on quota utilisation and the provisions on banking and borrowing should be kept to a minimum.

Apart from the TAC-related concerns, the Council of Ministers still has unfinished business in respect of multi-annual guidance programme IV, which has been mentioned tonight. We have yet to hear the Government's response to the report of the common fisheries policy review group and it would be useful if the Minister were to indicate when the Government intend to reply to that report. I congratulate those involved in the group, because their report was useful and took forward the debate on fisheries management. The Minister touched on the issue of technical conservation and the Commission's proposals and I share some of the concerns that he expressed. Finally, one of the most divisive issues is that of flagships, and a constant theme in tonight's debate has been how that problem can be dealt with. We believe that we can approach many of those difficulties within the context of a European fisheries management framework.

I agree with the Minister's comments in respect of the Guernsey dispute—a dispute relating to a country that is not within the common fisheries policy, which needs to be resolved through bilateral negotiations and agreements. With my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) I met the Guernsey fishermen to discuss the problem. The United Kingdom clearly has an interest and, although the Home Office is the lead Department in this matter, I hope that the Minister will look at the way in which the rules covering French territorial waters up to the 12-mile limit apply to the sort of trawlers that are banned from operating with the French 12-mile limit, but that are operating within the Guernsey island 12-mile limit. It does not seem unreasonable that the rules applicable in French waters should also apply within Guernsey waters.

Tonight's vote is not only about what is on the Order Paper, but about the fact that, for all the Government's fine words, nothing has been achieved on the flagship issue in the past 15 years. One attempt was made in 1988, but little has been done since. In terms of the motion, nothing has changed since last year—the Government have won no concessions on the flagship issue. I know that some hon. Members voted against last year's motion on a point of principle and I respect that, but there is no reason why they should turn around this year and embrace the motion tonight. Nothing has been gained for the industry and the same problems persist.

The Government have talked tough, but they talked tough about Spanish accession and that was conceded in the end. The hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) called on the Labour party to use the veto in the intergovernmental conference, but there are legitimate questions to be asked, such as whether protocol changes in the intergovernmental conference are the best or most appropriate way of dealing with the flagship issue. If it is possible to deal with the issue of flagships in the IGC, will the Minister tell us whether that will apply only to ships that come on to the register in future, or whether it can be made to apply retrospectively to those ships that are currently on the register? That is the pressing issue. Other member states may legitimately ask why, if the issue is so crucial to the UK, the Government did not make more of it when the common fisheries policy went through its mid-term review.

I give the hon. Member for Bridlington an undertaking. A future Labour Government will explore all appropriate ways—not only the IGC—to resolve the flagship issue and issues such as the six and 12-mile limits, which to us are non-negotiable, and more autonomy for coastal state nations within the CFP.

The hon. Member for Bridlington should not have had to ask, because no issue that we discussed tonight will be resolved until after the next general election. In that respect, all those problems are being left for a Labour Government to resolve. That is why, after 17 years, the Government are talking tough. It is easy to make all sorts of claims and promises before an election, knowing that those issues will not be dealt with. I know the underlying agenda.

A year from now, there will be a Labour Minister at the Dispatch Box and Conservative Members will be asking about those issues and drawing them to the Minister's attention. A year from now, I will remind them of that.

9.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): Tonight's debate was sometimes lively, sometimes thoughtful and sometimes very unthoughtful. It was made notable by the contributions and valedictory speeches on fisheries matters by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). They both said that, next year, when the fisheries debate takes place, for the first time for many years neither of them will be here. I say on behalf of the House that the annual debate will be the poorer, because no one doubts their commitment to fighting their constituents' corner. I will be here next year, however, replying to the debate.

Regrettably, for the second year in succession, no member of the shadow Scottish Office team bothered to take part in the debate. This year, no member of the shadow Scottish Office team even signed the motion standing in the name of the official Opposition. We may draw two possible conclusions: either that the members of the team could not be bothered or that they do not agree with the motion tabled in the name of the Opposition and might join the Government in the Lobby tonight. Indeed, the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), the shadow Scottish Secretary, did not even bother to attend the debate.

I hope to allay some of the fears that were expressed. We are all aware of the uncertainty of many fishermen about the future of their industry. Many of them feel threatened, for example by the growing interest of environmental bodies, by regulation from Brussels and by unfair competition. In the past year I have been at particular pains, therefore, to travel round Scotland to hear the industry's concerns at first hand. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch), have done likewise.

I hope that I have been able to act as an honest and accurate observer. I say that because, not only do I have the privilege of representing the considerable Scottish interest in the UK industry, but I have a personal interest because of the key role that fishing plays in my constituency.

When we focus on the problems of the sea fishing industry, we tend to forget that the industry remains viable and profitable. It continues to provide opportunities and rewards. The income of the whole fleet is up by 7 per cent. at a time when the Government have achieved historically low inflation, and that income has been shared among fewer boats.

If we are to safeguard that viability, we must acknowledge that the sea's natural resources are finite. The industry has changed significantly in recent years. The greater capacity of vessels to fish for longer periods, during the worst weather, over a greater sea area, using new electronic aids, means that we run the constant risk of taking too many fish out of the sea. If we put at risk the ability of some species to reproduce, we shall all be poorer.

In the debate, the Hague preference was mentioned by the hon. Members for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross), my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives and—repeatedly—by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). The EU has consistently recognised the need to sustain communities that depend heavily on fishing. That is why the system of Hague preferences allows the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland to secure a higher share of certain fish stocks when the total allowable catches fall below a certain threshold. By invoking the Hague preference, the UK can increase its share of selected quotas. For others, the UK needs to invoke the Hague preference to offset in part the impact of the Irish Republic's use of the Hague preference.

We recognise that it is unfortunate that the Hague preference mechanisms can work to the disadvantage of Northern Ireland fishermen as a result of the Irish Republic's use of them to gain extra quotas. That is why we have always made clear our readiness to engage in international swaps in order to help fishermen in the Province, recognising that they too are in an area of particular dependence.

We shall continue to invoke the Hague preference when it is in the United Kingdom's interest to do so, but we shall also seek to mitigate any disadvantage that Northern Ireland fishermen might suffer as a result of Irish invocation. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State said when he opened the debate, it is surely right, now that the United Kingdom is no longer a net beneficiary of the Hague preference, for us to review the whole system—away from this debate and away from the Council—early in the new year. At this morning's meeting, the industry accepted that.

Mr. Salmond: Given the new policy on the Hague preference that the Minister has enunciated this evening, can he give a guarantee that, as a result of any review, Scottish fishermen's entitlement will not be disadvantaged by the Government's new approach?

Mr. Robertson: Throughout the debate, the hon. Gentleman has displayed a singular lack of knowledge—indeed, complete ignorance—of what the Hague preference means. Throughout the debate, for his own party-political reasons, he has tried to put Scottish fishermen at the throats of Northern Ireland fishermen. When we invoke the Hague preference to the benefit of Scottish fishermen, in no way does it affect the Northern Ireland catch; only when the Republic invokes it is Northern Ireland affected.

The hon. Gentleman is making speeches all over Scotland comparing Scotland to the Republic, and saying that he would like Scotland to be another Republic of Ireland. We wondered what he meant by that, but now we know what he means: he wants to put Scottish fishermen at the throats of their Northern Ireland counterparts. That is not what the Hague preference is all about, and the hon. Gentleman should wake up to the reality.

The questions of the multi-annual guidance programme and quota-hopping have featured throughout the debate, and rightly so. Earlier this year, the Commission presented its proposals for a new set of medium-term targets to reduce fishing effort—the so-called MAGP. We expect to have a further discussion about those proposals in the Council later this week. While there should be no doubt that some further cut in fishing effort is necessary, the Commission's proposed cuts in fleet capacity go far beyond what member states consider reasonable or practical. Along with other member states, we have therefore been instrumental in pushing for the development of alternative approaches.

Let me repeat the assurances given earlier by my hon. Friend the Minister of State. What we are not prepared to do is run down the genuine United Kingdom fleet so that foreign interlopers can snap up UK quotas that are there for the benefit of our coastal communities. It cannot be right that vessels fishing against UK quotas, flying the Union flag, hardly ever land at UK ports.

Mr. Gill: Will my hon. Friend give the House a categorical assurance that, unless a satisfactory agreement is reached on quota-hopping, Her Majesty's Government will veto the proposed treaty at the intergovernmental conference?

Mr. Robertson: I think that I can best answer my hon. Friend by quoting from the interview given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to the BBC's "On the Record" yesterday. My right hon. and learned Friend was asked:

"It is not a case of speculating, is it? We know that there are some things that you will insist on getting out of that."

He answered:

"That we have made absolutely clear. For example, we believe the social chapter should not be introduced by the back door—that is something on which the Prime Minister has made our position very clear; we have to look out for the interests of our fishing communities who have been gravely damaged by the way in which the quota-hopping phenomena have been distorted very much to our disadvantage. These are two clear examples which are fundamental to our objectives in the negotiation."

My right hon. and learned Friend was further asked:

"And there will be no deal unless they go along with us on those issues? That is absolutely clear, is it?"

He replied:

"Yes. We have made it very clear. At the end of the day, the intergovernmental conference reaches a successful conclusion when all the member states are content with the outcome. We have indicated we will not be satisfied with an outcome that does not address . . . the two points I have just raised."

I can give my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) the categorical assurance that he seeks. We have told our European partners that this is a totally unsatisfactory state of affairs.

We shall resolve the problem of quota hoppers and we proposed a solution at the intergovernmental conference. As I have said, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made it clear over the weekend that the Government attach a high priority to that in the IGC. There can be no question of an agreement at Amsterdam without the issue of quota hoppers being addressed. In the mean time, we have made it crystal clear that we cannot contemplate imposing further compulsory fleet cuts on genuine UK fishermen. I give the House the absolute assurance that we remain firm in our resolve to tackle that problem.

My hon. Friends the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) and for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) raised the issue of the six and 12-mile limits. I noted carefully their comments about our rights to inshore waters. I remind them that when my right hon. Friend the Minister opened the debate he said that we had made it clear that for us the six and 12-mile limits are and will remain non-negotiable and that any interference with those limits was unacceptable. He described them as an essential derogation from the equal access provisions of the common fisheries policy. That derogation was conceded in 1972 and it is our firm intention to establish those restrictions definitively. In that sense we would not be prepared to accept any move to end them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) inquired about the safety group. The Government attach great importance to safety, which is a matter for the Department of Transport's Marine Safety Agency. I understand that discussions about the future organisation of the group are still taking place and I hope that they will soon reach a satisfactory conclusion. I assure my hon. Friend that I shall make sure that his concerns are passed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

My hon. Friends the Member for Bridlington and for Ludlow asked what was happening off Guernsey. It has been suggested that in some way the Government have abandoned Guernsey and its fishermen to pursue wider interests with France. That is untrue and in some ways misrepresents the efforts that are being made by Guernsey, the Government and France to reach a long-term solution. Both Guernsey and France are committed to act in moderation and have stressed the importance of reducing tension in the area. I understand that that constructive approach prevails and I welcome that development. The Royal Navy has been close to the area in dispute during the past week, and I assure the House that Royal Navy protection vessels will continue on standby should circumstances require it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington raised the issue of discards. I think we all agree that discarding fish is a terrible waste. We are concerned about how to tackle the problem, and that is one of the main reasons for the Government's decision to set up the fisheries conservation group. We shall pursue the conclusions of the group in respect of a range of conservation measures.

The issue of total allowable catches and quotas rightly featured prominently in the debate. The setting of TACs and quotas is always contentious and fishermen rightly see them as among the main constraints on the freedom to fish. Some regard them as a necessary evil while others think that they are completely unnecessary. However, they are happy to see increases from one year to the next and understandably dismayed when scientists recommend prudent reductions.

I do not adhere to the rather gloomy view that a reduction in one or other TAC necessarily renders fishing uneconomic. In practice, when fish are in short supply price increases can compensate for a reduction in volume, although the position varies from fishery to fishery. For example, following cuts in their TACs, this year's prices for mackerel and herring increased sharply from about £200 to more than £600 a tonne for good quality mackerel. Later this week the Fisheries Council will meet in Brussels to set a TAC for next year for stocks that we share with other member states. I do not expect that to be straightforward.

There have been representations about particular TACs and I shall seek to adjust the Commissioner's proposals where that is justified. We have already signalled to our European partners the importance that we attach to securing a range of increases on the Commissioner's proposals for white fish TACs around our coastline as well as for Irish sea herring. I am keen to maintain pressure to reduce by-catches of juvenile herring in the North sea, not least by setting a responsible TAC for North sea sprat. We shall be doing our utmost to secure an outcome that is in the UK fishing industry's best interests. This morning, my hon. Friend the Minister of State and I had a useful meeting with the UK industry and it was noticeable and heartening that its priorities and our priorities coincided almost identically. My hon. Friend and I have taken careful note of the views expressed by hon. Members today and, obviously, we will keep in close touch with fishermen's representatives before and during the Council on Thursday.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) raised the question of farm salmon. He knows that the Government are committed to the Scottish salmon farming industry, which makes an important contribution to the economy of the highlands and island of Scotland and to his constituency in particular. In view of the difficulties that have beset that sector in the past, I have been working with the Scottish industry to try to avoid further market disruption.

That has had one important positive result. Earlier this year, the Norwegian Government were persuaded to introduce feed quotas, which have reduced substantially salmon production in Norway, but, despite those measures, the salmon market has been depressed for more than a year, with the average market price for quality salmon having fallen by some 15 per cent. since last December.

Our industry's concern over competition in the European Union market has been such that the Government encouraged the Scottish Salmon Growers Association to submit an anti-dumping and anti-subsidy complaint to the EU. If convincing evidence comes to light from the Commission's investigation of those complaints, I have assured the industry of the Government's wholehearted backing.

I had hoped that the Norwegian Government's feed restrictions would lead to a recovery in the latter part of this year, but that failed to materialise, so the Government formally requested that minimum import prices for a limited period were reintroduced. Despite efforts to persuade Commissioner Bonino of the case for such temporary action, that request has been rejected.

I am appalled by such insensitive treatment of the industry and of the entire highlands and islands of Scotland, which the Commission recognises as an area of particular need. Mrs. Bonino told me that the European market for salmon had been stable in recent months, if prices were monitored in ecu, but she fails to realise that our salmon farmers are paid not in ecu, but in sterling.

Over the weekend at the Dublin summit, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made clear to President Santer the Government's dissatisfaction about the handling of the UK request. He has asked President Santer to take a personal interest in the matter, which we expected would have been considered by the College of Commissioners as a whole. At the Fisheries Council this week, I shall repeat that concern and I look to the Commission to recognise that Scottish producers are entitled to some safeguards while their complaints about dumping and subsidies are investigated.

We have had a useful debate. My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I have listened to various concerns—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. I can barely hear the Minister.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend and I have listened to the various concerns that have been expressed and we will consider those further before Thursday's Council. Our basic aim for the Council on Thursday and Friday, and Saturday if necessary, is simple enough. It is to achieve the best deal possible for our fishermen, having regard both to their immediate and to their longer-term needs. Our primary concern in the debate has been to focus on the practical problems facing our fishermen, to show what action we have taken and what further actions we have in hand to protect the long-term interests of this great industry.

There are no simple quick solutions, no panaceas to these problems. I say to some of my hon. Friends who campaign for leaving the CFP that such an approach will be of no practical help to the fishermen whom we all seek to help. It will not solve any of the problems simply to draw new lines on the maps of our seas. Our fishermen are looking for their interests to be strongly and effectively represented at the Fisheries Council in Brussels. That is what my hon. Friend the Minister of State and I intend to do.

We recognise that our fishermen are looking for a fair deal on TACs and that Northern Ireland's fishermen are looking to be protected from the full impact of the Hague preference system. We know that our fishermen are not happy with the Commission's proposals for reducing fishing fleets—and certainly not with the erosion of UK quotas at the hands of quota hoppers.

Conservative Members are facing up to those problems. Not for us the playing of politics, using the livelihoods of Britain's fishermen in some tawdry little game that has nothing to do with fishing and everything to do with trying to embarrass the Government. We will have none of that. We will leave that to Opposition Members, but to treat one of our country's oldest and finest industries with such contempt is to the eternal shame of Opposition Members. We can represent the interests of fishermen more effectively if we go to Brussels with the wholehearted support of the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. David Clelland and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document COM(96)641 relating to the fixing of total allowable catches for 1997 and certain conditions under which they may be fished; and supports the Government's intention to negotiate the best possible fishing opportunities for British fishermen consistent with scientific advice and the need to sustain the stocks for the benefit of future generations of fishermen.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A rumour is spreading round Westminster that a car park pass in the name of an hon. Member is being used by someone else who is associated with the leadership of the official Opposition. Will you confirm that car park passes should be used only by those who are officially authorised to use them?

Madam Speaker: Order. I do not deal in rumours.

ADJOURNMENT (CHRISTMAS)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 22 (Periodic adjournments),

That this House, at its rising on Wednesday 18th December, do adjourn till Monday 13th January.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation,

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Northern Ireland

That the draft Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, which was laid before this House on 20th November, be approved.

That the draft Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland Consequential Amendments) Order 1997, which was laid before this House on 20th November, be approved.

COUNTY COURTS

That the draft High Court and County Courts Jurisdiction (Amendment) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 25th November, be approved.

FINANCIAL SERVICES

That the Financial Services Act 1986 (Extension of Scope of Act) Order 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 2958), a copy of which was laid before this House on 25th November, be approved.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

That the Bill be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

Question agreed to.

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That at the meeting of the Committee on Monday 13th January, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (3) of Standing Order No. 94E (Scottish Grand Committee (bills in relation to their principle)), the Chairman shall put any Question necessary to dispose of any Motion which may be made in relation to the Flood Prevention and Land Drainage (Scotland) Bill at half-past Two o'clock, if not previously concluded.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

PETITION

Children's Hospital (Manchester)

10.32 pm

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): The 1,000 names of Stockport residents on this petition were collected by Mr. and Mrs. Geldard and their family. They are determined that the recommendations of the Ashworth report be implemented so that no other family should have to undergo the pain and anguish that they have suffered and still suffer. The petition states:

In December 1995 10-year-old Nicholas Geldard died of a brain haemorrhage after a 12-hour ordeal. He had been shunted between four hospitals because there were no paediatric intensive care beds available in Manchester. An inquiry into Nicholas's death found many failings in the local health service and made major recommendations.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Health to ensure the urgent establishment of single specialist children's hospital in Manchester where children can be diagnosed and treated; that in the interim all children's intensive care services are reorganised to ensure that children's lives are not put at risk through bad organisation; and that those hospitals with paediatric intensive care beds be ordered to publish details of usage of those beds and how many children have been turned away each month, so the public can make sure that every sick child in need has access to a local intensive care bed.

To lie upon the Table.

Green Belt

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

10.34 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I am grateful to have the opportunity to raise the subject of the protection of the green belt. There is no doubt that the green belt policy, which has been in place for almost 50 years, has been successful.

The metropolitan green belt is well established. Most of my constituency lies within it. Without it, we probably would have had urban sprawl and ribbon development all the way between London and Oxford, if not further afield. The green belt policy is certainly firmly supported by the two local authorities that cover my constituency—South Buckinghamshire district council and Wycombe district council.

There is always the need for constant vigilance of the green belt. There is constant development pressure on my constituency, which already has three motorways—the M4, the M25 and the M40.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): There is no doubt that there is pressure on the green belt, but does my hon. Friend know of the plan to build 868,000 more houses in the south-east of England by 2011? That will certainly put enormous pressure on the green belt.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and very much agree with him. We need to try to ensure that as many of those houses as possible are built in urban areas on reclaimed derelict land, rather than in the green belt where they would take up more of our lovely countryside.

There is constant pressure on the green belt. As well as the three motorways in my constituency, there is gravel extraction, the proposed expansion of terminal 5 at Heathrow, the complementary relocation of the Perry Oaks sludge treatment works to Iver, the Eton rowing trench and the Maidenhead flood relief scheme. I am glad to say that we saw off the threatened Central Railway project.

The Maidenhead flood relief scheme is under construction by the Environment Agency. One might think that a body called the Environment Agency would be particularly concerned about the environment. Construction of the scheme has only just begun, yet in a letter from the chairman of Dorney parish council, Mr. Ken Richmond tells me:

"it is becoming apparent that the Environment Agency has little or no interest in the local environment or in our opinions as to how the problems which the Agency is causing could be addressed."

Mr. Richmond also sent me three photographs of the desecration that the Environment Agency has already caused. Unfortunately, it is not possible to reproduce photographs in Hansard. I wish it were; it would probably be a little bit more interesting if it were illustrated. All that evidence underlines the need to adopt an absolutist policy on protecting the green belt. There should be no exceptions to the policy; we must have a very tough approach and be vigorous at all times.

Given the context, I must say to my hon. Friend the Minister that I read with some amazement the latest consultation paper issued by the Department of the Environment, which is entitled:

"Proposed New Permitted Development Right To Extend The Garden Of A Dwellinghouse."

It was published last month, and says:

"The Department is concerned that the benefits of requiring a planning application are not significant".

I strongly challenge that assertion. I believe that they are significant and that the damage that would be done if one did not have to get planning permission to extend a garden into the green belt has been grossly underestimated by my hon. Friend's Department.

The paper goes on:

"Concern has been expressed to the Department that the requirement to obtain planning permission . . . is an unnecessary burden."

Could my hon. Friend tell me by whom that concern has been expressed? I was unaware of a great clamour for a change in the law in this respect. Most people understand that they need planning permission and accept it.

The paper continues:

"It is argued that neighbouring householders and other users of adjacent land would not be adversely affected".

I beg to differ with that too. Neighbouring householders could be severely adversely affected by the proposal. Indeed, some already have difficulty with what people do in their gardens. If the new right were introduced, life would be made even more difficult for them. The paper states:

"very little is . . . gained in planning terms by the current controls in this area."

I strongly disagree with that too.

On the document's second page—its main virtue being its brevity—which is also to do with extending a garden, it says:

"Householders would . . . be able to fence the land, erect porches, garden sheds, tennis courts, garages and oil tanks, and install swimming pools, satellite antenna and hard surfaces subject to the same restrictions currently set out in the Order for existing gardens."

That could all be done without any planning permission.

The next paragraph says:

"There would be no restriction to the area which could be added to a curtilage under the proposed permitted development right."

In ordinary language, that means that one could buy a five-acre field, fence round it, make it one's garden and, over a period of time, build any number of swimming pools, tennis courts or whatever.

I received a response to that from the director of planning services of South Buckinghamshire district council, Mr. Paul Geehan, who is an excellent planning officer. He said:

"I was absolutely amazed to receive the attached consultation paper from the DOE. Essentially the proposed changes in planning rules would allow householders to annex an area of countryside, including the Green Belt, and incorporate it into their garden. They would then have the same permitted development rights to build in the extended gardens as currently exist in existing gardens or grounds of houses. These include covered swimming pools, domestic stable blocks, domestic garages, sheds, laying a hard surface, summerhouses, etc. Providing these buildings were more than 5 metres from the dwelling, no higher than 3 metres (with a flat roof) or 4 metres (with a ridged roof) and did not cover more than 50 per cent. of the total curtilage excluding the original dwelling, basically people could do what they liked providing it stayed ancillary to the residential use.

With your intimate knowledge of the green belt, you do not need me to tell you the sort of things people get up to and the pressure the area is under. The proposal now before us would give a green light to urbanising the Green Belt and if it goes ahead, I believe its impact would be disastrous."

Mr. Steen: I follow my hon. Friend's argument about the green belt and I agree with it, but that is as far as I would go. Would he be happy to confine his remarks to the green belt? Does he agree that extensions should be allowed to houses and in green fields that are surplus to agricultural use, as set out in the Green Paper?

Mr. Smith: I am not at all sure about that. My main concern is with the green belt, because the whole of my constituency lies within it. My hon. Friend is better qualified to speak on other matters.

"As an example of what could be done, a householder living in a property on the edge of the Green Belt could buy the next field, annex it to his property and build over at least half the field. Providing the use were for the householder and his family, subject to the height restriction already mentioned they could build an indoor swimming pool and changing area, a stable block and other buildings for pets, a tennis court, a new drive, a multi-car garage block, a recreation complex (e.g. snooker/gymnasium), sheds, domestic workshops, greenhouses, caravan hardstanding area, summerhouses, a chapel etc., etc., etc. Even if one of these developments were carried out, Green Belt policy would be seriously undermined. In addition of course, there would be nothing in planning terms to stop playing fields or areas of open space being annexed. The proposal seems to be in conflict with national policy on keeping Green Belts open (PPG2) and on policies which stress the value of recreation and open space (PPG17)."

I have had a similar letter from Stoke Poges parish council, where I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby) lives; he has considerable knowledge of the area. The clerk there said:

"These dangers are already apparent in Stoke Poges. For example, I enclose a map of some land at the rear of properties in West End Lane and Park Road indicating where fences have been erected partitioning off a field in the green belt. It is very important to preserve these fringe areas of green belt otherwise the extent of the green belt will be eroded and its aims and objects impaired. In this case not only is the green belt affected but public footpaths interfered with."

The purposes of the green belt are set out in planning policy guidance note 2. They include the aims "to check unrestricted sprawl of large built-up areas"

" to safeguard surrounding countryside from further encroachment."

In my view, although it sounds like a modest measure of deregulation, the Department of the Environment's proposal could be the thin end of the wedge. It undermines the objectives of PPG2, and I hope that when the consultation comes to an end the Department will throw it out.

Sir Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): With the permission of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), I should like to contribute briefly to this important debate.

When I first saw the deregulation news release from the Department of the Environment, I thought for a moment that the publication date had to be 1 April, in which case I could have understood why it had been sent to me. I certainly thought that it was a hoax of the first order.

I am astonished and amazed that the release could have crept out of the Department under the guise of deregulation. I have such respect for my hon. Friend the Minister that I can only assume that he was away on holiday when it was sent out.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield has correctly pointed out a number of things that could happen if the ghastly proposal ever came to fruition. The owner of the extended garden would probably want to fence it. That would result in small pockets of land, or whole fields, sprouting fences up to 2 m high without the need for planning permission. That would break up the countryside and damage the all-important concept of openness, which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are well aware is one of the crucial criteria for green belt land.

Since half a garden may be covered with buildings, sheds, hard-standings and the like, developments could include multi-storey garages, indoor or outdoor swimming pools, recreation rooms and stable blocks—later perhaps to be converted to a granny bungalow when the owner discovers that he does not have any horses. Although existing rights of way would not be expunged, one can imagine that they might soon be obstructed, or that the owner might try to have cross-field paths legally closed on the ground of lack of use. As we all know, most people are reluctant to cross what looks like a private garden. Such rights of way might be diverted to the edge of the property.

What about a person who wanted to conduct some activities which are unacceptable in the green belt? He could buy a house bordering it, buy the land behind the house, fence that land and then conduct the activity while claiming that it was related to the amenities of the house and within its curtilage. Alternatively, the person might already own the land behind the house, buy the house, unite the two sites and proceed to behave as I have described.

The Department might say that such suggestions are far-fetched, but I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister, given his knowledge of the subject, will readily agree that such manoeuvres can take place. They are real problems, which arise in real life.

The proposal, were it to come to pass, would create what I can only describe as shed city on the green belt. It would set neighbour against neighbour. It would be a nightmare for planning officers, for councillors of every kind, and, not least, for hon. Members. We would be faced at our constituency surgeries by angry constituents who had discovered that they could do absolutely nothing about the buildings that had sprouted up on the green belt land near their homes.

It is a matter of great regret that there are only a few days to object to the proposal. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to tell the House that he is willing to consider extending the period for consultation so that elected representatives of every kind can have the opportunity to make their objections known.

I am sorry to say that I feel that the consultation paper is the most ill thought-out, environmentally damaging and unsustainable suggestion that the planning profession has been requested to respond to in recent times. It is difficult to believe that the Department is serious, particularly at a time of increasing environmental awareness and support for the protection of the countryside for its own sake.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield rightly asked what are the concerns that have been referred to in the consultation document and have apparently been expressed to the Department. There is no evidence to support what has been asserted. The amount of concern and the importance to be attached to it needs to be seriously questioned. [Interruption.] I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am running out of puff. I regret to say that I strongly oppose the Department's proposal, and I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the effect that it might have on the effectiveness of Thames valley water, which has helped to restore my voice to this debate.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) for providing the opportunity to discuss this important matter. I agree wholeheartedly with him about the green belt, and about the suburbanisation of the countryside. What better example of that can there be than the constituency of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary who is to reply to the debate? Croydon was once a wonderful rural area, but it is now totally suburban. There is something to be said for guarding against the expansion of the green belt.

I would like to throw in the caveat that we must distinguish between green belt land and green-field sites. The idea that green-field sites might end up full of tarmacadamed drives, stable blocks, granny flats and swimming pools seems to suggest that people who own their own land will lower the value of that land. Self-interest and private enterprise are the hallmarks of the Conservative party, and deregulation is at the centre of our economic policy. I am fortunate enough to chair the Conservative party's Back-Bench committee on deregulation.

I agree that the inclusion of the green belt extension is a damaging precedent, but the use of alternative land means that green fields go fallow. That is a tremendous burden on the public purse, and the money could be used for something useful. One must conclude that people who own land will use it to the best advantage, and we must remember that there is a distinction between the green belt and green fields.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): We must congratulate the Environment Agency on one point. It now contains the National Rivers Authority, which was responsible for the glass of water that allowed my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby) to conclude his speech.

This has been a much more entertaining debate than I expected—that was this week's understatement. When the Government publish a consultation document, we like to receive varied opinions and reactions to it. We try to put the document in the simplest of forms so that it can get the fullest of answers. This evening, we have had the fullest of answers, with two of my hon. Friends on one side and one on the other.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on raising this matter. By the time he finished, I had visions of Barnum and Bailey or Ringling Brothers' circus being parked in his and his neighbours' back yards. That was a slight exaggeration. There is a consultation document, and I shall take the points raised in the debate on board. We will read tomorrow the points raised by my hon. Friends, and ensure that they go into the consultation.

We accepted that effective limits would be set by the criteria that the land must form part of the curtilage of the house and be used for purposes incidental to the enjoyment of the house. The slight exaggerations that we heard this evening—although emphasising a point—were a little beyond the pale. We are not talking about huge garden extensions that cover large parts of the countryside and change its real nature. We have issued the consultation document on the proposals, and we specifically asked for views on the principle and the detail. Careful attention will be paid to those views. It is worth reiterating that this is part of a full package that includes policy planning guidance note 2, which refers to green belts.

It is worth stating one or two facts about green belts to emphasise the importance of bringing the discussion document into perspective. Green belts are popular at home and are widely admired abroad. I remember as a child looking at pictures of the English countryside, and it is a beautiful part of the English scenery that we all know—including those who come here as tourists. Since 1979, the extent of green belt land has more than doubled, and it now covers 12 per cent. of England—some 3.8 million acres. This also applies to the metropolitan green belt—as has been mentioned this evening—which covers a substantial part of the region around London and the home counties. About 21 per cent. of the south-east is formally designated as green belt, and it encompasses some of our thriving towns. Green belt land is very important—it remains an essential tool for containing urban sprawl and it is one of our major assets.

Housing policy and the difficulties with development that we will encounter were mentioned. When discussing that policy we have to recognise that the Government have acted in various ways to ensure that development and new households—the demand for which is there, whether we like it or not—are brought to so-called brown land. We are already succeeding—about 50 per cent. of new dwellings are on brown land and we hope that that figure will rise.

I appreciate my hon. Friends' comments, especially those of my hon. Friends the Members for Beaconsfield and for Uxbridge, both of whose constituencies are on the edges of London. It is vital that we retain the green belt and I back my hon. Friends all the way.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Eleven o'clock.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

KING'S COLLEGE LONDON BILL [LORDS]

Ordered,

That the Promoters of the King's College London Bill [Lords] may, notwithstanding anything in the Standing Orders or practice of this House, proceed with the Bill in the present Session; and the Petition for the Bill shall be deemed to have been deposited and all Standing Orders applicable thereto shall be deemed to have been complied with;

That if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the present Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the last Session;

That, as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be read the first and second time (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read) and shall be ordered to be read the third time;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during any previous Session.—[The Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Traffic Policy (London)

1. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will commission a study of the effect of pedestrianisation and traffic rerouting schemes on local socio-economic developments in the London boroughs. [7851]

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): Circumstances all over London are so different that I do not believe that an overall study would help. Nevertheless, it is up to local highway authorities to ensure that pedestrianisation and traffic rerouting encourage trade in local shops, ensure proper parking provision for shoppers and provide a safe and attractive environment.

Mr. Dykes: I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for his courtesy in answering the question himself. There is no reason why he should be conversant with the details of the Wealdstone traffic bypass scheme, but will he ask his officials to look into it, bearing in mind the fact that the pedestrianisation and traffic bypass configuration are causing local traders a severe loss of business? Would it be possible for an advisory group of his officials to put right the wrong decisions made by local officials and councillors in the original scheme?

Mr. Gummer: I am happy to see whether my officials can help Harrow. It is crucial that local businesses should be given the best trading opportunities, particularly in an area such as Wealdstone. I am sorry that the council appears not to have taken that properly into account.

Mr. MacShane: With London the most clogged-up capital in Europe, is not the best news for pedestrianisation in the capital the fact that Ministers' drivers are threatening to strike, which may make Ministers get out and walk, use the tube or the buses, or get on their bikes? For the first time in a long time, they will see how ordinary people have to live and move in London. Will the Secretary of State give us a clear commitment, before he goes into obscurity, that London will follow Europe and have more pedestrianised zones in the city centre?

Mr. Gummer: As I understand it, London is in Europe. The hon. Gentleman is kind to favour us with his presence today from Geneva. No doubt he knows a great deal about the various capitals of Europe. I do not believe that his comparison between traffic in London and that in the rest of Europe is remotely accurate. If he spent enough time here to see how much we have been doing to improve traffic and pedestrianisation arrangements in London—not least the plans for Trafalgar square and Parliament square—he would be able to ask a more helpful question.

Local Government Finance

2. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the local authority associations on the 1997 revenue support grant settlement. [7852]

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): None, yet.

Mr. Hoyle: Does the Minister agree that his Government give with one hand and take with the other? For the penny reduction in income tax, the public will have to pay at least 2p in council tax. Does the Minister realise that, if the Government were a company, they would be prosecuted for fraud?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman is clearly subject to some arithmetical confusion. The Government have reduced income tax. Council taxes will rise somewhat because we have always felt that it is sensible to return some financial autonomy to local government. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Just wait. That is what local authorities keep telling me that they want. It is interesting that, when the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who leads for the Opposition, addressed local government associations last week, he said that a Labour Government would spend much more on direct grants to local authorities to enable them to deliver what the Government wanted. I want to give local government more autonomy and he wants to give it less. If he does not trust his councils, why should anybody else?

Mr. Atkins: Will my right hon. Friend be sure not to listen to any representations from Lancashire county council, especially if they contradict the representations that he has had from Lancashire Conservative Members? He listened to our representations and deferred the area cost adjustment, which was being pressed by the Labour party and would have cost Lancashire some £20 million. Does he recognise that he will receive the thanks of Lancashire Conservatives and of Lancashire folk as a whole for listening to what we said to him?

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend is right to say that he and other Conservative Members made representations on the area cost adjustment. It is true that I felt that there were problems that had to be resolved before we could address whether that mechanism could be adapted to the standard spending assessment. We have asked local authorities to suggest what work needs to be done to take the matter forward. If Lancashire wants to make representations to me, I must, of course, be willing to listen. However, as he would expect, I always listen to local government representations, with a long list of questions to which I want answers in return.

Mr. Rendel: Is the Minister aware of the letter writing campaign of Cabinet Ministers, and no doubt other Conservative Members to head teachers and chairs of governors peddling the myth that the Government are providing more money for education this year? Is he further aware that the recipients of the letters treat them with scorn and ridicule because they know that the blame for education cuts lies with the Government, not local education authorities?

Mr. Curry: It is normal for hon. Members to want to be in regular contact with their teachers and local education authorities; I am, in my constituency. No doubt hon. Members will want to make it clear that local authorities, except those caught by the rule on absolute excess, can increase spending on the passported services, of which education is the most important, over and above what they spend now by the full amount of the standard spending assessment increase, without penalty or cash cuts in the other services. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will convey that message to his head teachers.

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the local government settlement was far better than many local authorities had expected? Would not their complaints about funding gain more credence if authorities embraced compulsory competitive tendering by encouraging the private sector to bid rather than awarding contracts in-house, and paid more attention to collecting taxes and rents?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is right to say that local authorities have a prime duty to perform the basic management functions of local government efficiently. The filling of voids in council houses and the collection of rents and council tax, which is proving to be a good tax and one that is easy to collect, are the prerequisites of good local government. He asked whether local authorities thought that the increase was reasonable. I sometimes get the impression that, if the Archangel Gabriel were to fly across the country distributing £10 notes, local authorities would still find a way of saying that the settlement was inadequate.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Minister confirm that, early next year, he will expect Conservative Members to vote for a local government grant settlement that will mean that the citizens of Westminster will contribute only 4 per cent. towards the cost of their council services, while council tax payers in the average Conservative constituency will contribute 25 per cent., and that some Conservative Members will be voting for a settlement that will require their council tax payers to contribute more than 40 per cent. of the cost of their local services—10 times what will be asked of people in Westminster?

Mr. Curry: I know that the hon. Gentleman has had a bad week, what with his little local difficulty in Camden and the Sunday newspapers saying that he was about to be demoted, so I understand why he has not asked an especially good question.

Because Westminster sets a level of expenditure well below its standard spending assessment, it depends a lot less on what has to be raised from local taxpayers than other councils, which set a level well above SSA. If everyone ran as prudent a council as Westminster, less tax would be imposed on people. It is about time that people realised that the hon. Gentleman's only interest is in waging a prolonged war against Westminster. The citizens of Westminster will note that, in the event of a Labour Government, they will be the first to cop it, with the rest of the country shortly behind.

Citizens Juries

3. Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to promote the use of citizens juries in local government and planning matters. [7853]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): We are currently undertaking, with the local government associations, research on issues surrounding public participation in local government, which could include citizens juries.

Dr. Wright: May I ask the Minister to be slightly more interested in the reply that he has just given me and to give the House a sense that he genuinely wants to know about some of the innovations and experiments that are going on in local authorities throughout the country? For example, there is a scheme in Lewisham, involving young people on drugs; and one in Hertfordshire, involving local people in waste management issues.

Is the clue to the Government's attitude to be found in the letter from the Deputy Prime Minister that appeared in newspapers recently, describing the Government's approach to public services and saying that they were not attracted by the idea of new democratic bodies, because they attracted the enthusiasts?

Sir Paul Beresford: We are certainly interested, and I am aware of the cases to which the hon. Gentleman refers; hence the conclusion that we might examine the matter in the research. The difference is that, in court juries, the selection is random and, as critics have pointed out, juries of the kind that he is talking about are not. I am sure that he would not want juries, whether on planning or on personality selection, to be rigged.

Mr. Wilkinson: It would be an excellent idea to have a jury in the local government area of Hillingdon, where the socialist borough council is seeking to foist on local people plans for social housing in green-belt land, on the St. Vincent's hospital site and on Field End recreation ground. Those plans are bitterly opposed by local people. Is it not the case that, if local people were properly consulted and if the council heeded the objections of the Department of the Environment, such monstrosities would not be foisted on the electorate?

Sir Paul Beresford: My hon. Friend is aware that there was a spontaneous jury in his area: about 4,000 objections were received at the second stage of the unitary development plan, and that is probably a record.

Green-belt Land

4. Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his policy towards providing protection for green-belt land in planning legislation. [7854]

Mr. Gummer: I have pledged myself to defend the green belt. That attitude extends to metropolitan open land and to the attempt by some local authorities to sell off school playing fields.

Mr. Davies: Is the Secretary of State aware that the Labour council in Oldham is planning on dumping the best part of 2 million cu m of industrial spoil on green-belt land in Beal valley? It can do that because it claims that the end use will be a golf course. Is he aware that a council of any political complexion could in theory dump on green-belt land for the best part of 100 years by claiming that the end use would be an approved development? Should not the guidelines be toughened to stop such despoliation?

Mr. Gummer: I am aware that, after extensive consultation by the borough of which the hon. Gentleman is a member, it received only 21 letters, one of which was from himself. It is therefore extremely difficult to believe that the local authority—although it is not an authority that I support—has got it wrong. There are occasions when despoiling of green belt needs to be remedied, and sometimes that is done by the proper use of filling. That may or may not be right in the case to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but it is for the local authority to make its decision, and he had a great opportunity, as a member of that authority, to put his case.

Sir Kenneth Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a good way of protecting the green belt is to enhance the vitality of town centres, and will he therefore develop policy to curtail large out-of-town retail developments?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right. Creating such vitality would not only protect the green belt but draw people back into town centres, to live, work, shop and carry out leisure pursuits. That seems to be the right way forward, and I am glad that the Labour party has now begun to agree.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: Does the Secretary of State think that opencast coal mining on the green belt should ever be justified? Will he make it clear that opencast coal mining applications on green-belt land will not be allowed?

Mr. Gummer: I remind the hon. Lady that it was I who changed the presumption against opencast coal mining, which her party never did and had never pressed before. I did it without Labour's help—

Mr. Hardy: That is wrong.

Mr. William O'Brien: The Minister is wrong.

Mr. Gummer: Hon. Gentlemen must not say what is untrue. I changed that presumption because I take the view that there should be very specific reasons for allowing opencast coal mining. I have been extremely careful in checking each application.

Mr. Steen: Is not the threat of 4 million new houses being built on the green belt due to the fact that people have difficulty living together? Every time a marriage breaks up, two houses are needed where one home was needed before. In order to cater for the 4 million new houses that will be needed in Britain by 2011, will my right hon. Friend ban building on green-field sites until the inner cities and land inside city boundaries is full? Many such areas have much vacant land at the moment, which could and should be used first.

Mr. Gummer: I have made it absolutely clear that I do not intend to allow building on open spaces as a means of satisfying the need for 4.4 million homes. I have said that that building should take place to the maximum possible on areas that have already been used—on the present footprint. I intend to insist on that.

Beaches

5. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to amend the criteria for publishing lists of beaches conforming or not conforming to European Union legislation on bathing water cleanliness. [7855]

The Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency (Mr. Robert B. Jones): At present, we have no plans to amend the Department's current practice in that regard.

Mr. Morgan: As it has now emerged from recent written answers that I have received that 117 out of 346 English beaches and 22 out of 55 Welsh beaches failed the faecal streptococci test in 1996—the key test for determining public health consequences of swimming in dirty sea water—does the Minister agree that the Government need to change their policy and the environmental information that they publish for people about to use our beaches? If he promises to do something about that today, I in turn will promise never again to use the hoary chestnut about the need for real action on clean sea water rather than just going through the motions.

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman revels in undermining the British tourist industry, and that is a disgrace. I shall give him a clear piece of advice. So long as there is a Conservative Government, we shall conduct affairs based on proper understanding of science and risk. If there were ever to be a Labour Government, their windfall tax would ensure that there was no room for improvement in standards, as well as hitting people's pensions and creating unemployment in the water industry.

Mr. Mans: Will my hon. Friend congratulate all those in Fylde who have helped to make the beaches around Blackpool and Fleetwood so much cleaner? Will he join the leader of the Labour council in Blackpool and other local Labour politicians in their criticism of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) for his ill-informed criticism and comments on the clean-up of the Fylde coast?

Mr. Jones: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. He will remember that rainy winter's day when he and I stood on the front at Fleetwood considering possible remedies to the problem. Together, we conducted a campaign to ensure that Blackpool's beaches were improved. I congratulate him on his achievement, which has certainly done a great deal for the tourist industry in his area.

Mr. Meacher: Further to the Government's emphasis on their record, will the Minister confirm that, in 1990, the Secretary of State for the Environment claimed that all bathing waters in the United Kingdom would be brought up to European standards by 1995? On that basis, will he explain how, in 1996, 47 UK beaches officially failed to reach the European mandatory minimum standard—more than the number that failed it last year—and some of them failed it due to pollution more than 20 times above the maximum permitted limit? Since the Secretary of State likes to use his family to persuade us that things are safe, will he allow them to swim off those beaches?

Mr. Jones: Perhaps I could remind the hon. Gentleman that the late unlamented Labour Government, of whom he was an especially undistinguished member, had a moratorium on investment in the water and sewerage industries, as a result of which the privatised water industry had to cope with a huge backlog. None the less, we are making rapid progress.

Anti-social Tenants

6. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to provide assistance to local authorities in respect of anti–social tenants. [7856]

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): The Housing Act 1996 contains a package of measures to help local authorities deal with anti-social tenants.

Mr. Thompson: The Government's recent announcements are good news for many council tenants in my constituency of Norwich, North. They provide another example of the good that the Government have done for my constituents since 1983. Complaints about anti-social tenants feature strongly in my constituency surgeries, so the news is indeed good. Can my hon. Friend ensure that Norwich city council starts the introductory tenancy scheme at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend is right about the good news for tenants—the vast majority of tenants, who want to be protected from the activities of anti-social tenants. Norwich council would do well to consider the proposals for introductory tenancies, as well as strengthening the grounds for obtaining possession against anti-social tenants and making it easier to give evidence against tenants who behave badly and intimidate law-abiding tenants. All those measures will be important in helping the vast majority of law-abiding tenants.

Mr. Betts: If the Government are so concerned about the problem of anti-social tenants, and want to take action, why did they reject Opposition amendments tabled to the Housing Bill in Committee, with the support of Labour local authorities and their tenants, especially those designed to extend witness protection schemes to all occupiers irrespective of tenure, and in very serious cases to extend the use of injunctions with mandatory powers of arrest? The Minister, in particular, rejected those amendments, although local authorities and tenants want the powers to be used.

Mr. Clappison: If the hon. Gentleman read the Act, he would see that it attaches the power of arrest to injunctions. He will remember that, when the Committee examined in detail the Labour party's proposal for a community safety order, it was found to be an unsatisfactory and unworkable mess that was not even pressed to a vote. He may also remember that, when proposals came before the House to impose secure training orders on youngsters who persistently commit serious criminal offences, the Opposition voted against them. Talk is cheap, but the Labour party has no stomach for firm action.

Out-of-town Shopping Developments

7. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his Department's planning guidance for out-of-town shopping developments. [7857]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: In June, we published the revised policy planning guidance note 6, "Town Centres and Retail Developments", which is designed to provide stronger support for town centres. We shall report progress on the Government response to the Environment Committee next month.

Mr. O'Brien: I thank the Minister for that reply, but the Government's belated recognition of the issue of town centre development has caused much damage to many urban centres, including those in my constituency such as Ossett, Rothwell and Normanton, as well as the neighbouring towns of Horbury and Wakefield. Out-of-town shopping developments such as Asda and Meadowhall generate car use and damage the environment. Can the Minister assure communities and local authorities that turn down planning applications for out-of-town shopping developments that the developer must prove beyond any shadow of doubt an overwhelming need for such facilities before the Department will give approval?

Mr. Jones: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's proposition, because that is Government policy. All applications are dealt with against the background not only of PPG6, with the rigorous tests that he mentioned, but of PPG13, which focuses on the issue with which he started—traffic generation—so I can certainly give him those assurances. I find it disappointing that there are still councils that do not judge such issues against the background of PPG6 and PPG13, with the result that we have to call applications in for examination at a public inquiry. It would be much better if that were not the case.

Mr. Day: Does my hon. Friend agree that, although the Government's change of policy on out-of-town shopping developments has been most welcome, for some areas—such as my constituency—it has come too late? We now have a large shopping development at Cheadle Royal, with another two miles away at Handforth Dean in the Tatton constituency. Those developments have had a significant impact on the villages of Cheadle, Cheadle Hulme, Heald Green and Bramhall. Given that the Government obviously recognise the damage that has been inflicted by changing the policy, will they not consider going a step further and looking at the possibility of reducing business rates for small retailers in a five-mile radius of new shopping stores?

Mr. Jones: As my hon. Friend knows, rateable value is based on the going rents in a particular area and any decline in the relative prosperity of a particular village or town will eventually come through in terms of a differential in the rateable value of those out-of-town sites.

Local Government Finance

8. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effect of his public expenditure proposals for local government on the provision of local authority services. [7858]

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made to the House on 27 November.

Mr. Cohen: Is it not the case that central Government funding for local education authorities is increasing by only 0.5 per cent. in cash terms—well below pay and price inflation? Far from there being new money for education, do not one third of local education authorities face a cash cut in central funding next year? Are not the Government to blame for more stress and slash in education and other council services, and for an increase in council taxes of more than 6 per cent. next year?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman will know that, if local authorities succeed in attracting parents to their nursery schools, and therefore parents use cash vouchers to educate their children in local authority schools, not a single local authority will suffer a cash cut in its education SSA next year. We have made special provision so that the increase in education SSA can be passported straight through on top of existing levels of spending.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in a letter of 9 December, the clerk of Lancashire county council admitted that the council does not have time to make a judgment on the levels set by the Government? Is he further aware that the council spends its entire time criticising those levels without having properly assessed them?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is closely attuned to the pulse of Lancashire, and she speaks for a great many ordinary people in Lancashire who know what the local authority gets up to. If I had to listen to the advice of Lancashire county council or my hon. Friend, I would take her advice every day of the week.

Mrs. Mahon: Will the Minister confirm that, if Calderdale council had received as much grant per head as Westminster this year, it would not have had to collect a council tax at all and could have given £290 back to each council tax payer? Is he further aware that, if the council had received the same help for education as Westminster, it could have employed another 831 teachers?

Mr. Curry: I wonder whether the hon. Lady is aware that, if all local authorities had received the same revenue support grant as Islington—together with that for the precepting authorities—it would have been worth £897.61 a head, and the average band D council tax would have been reduced by more than £1,500, making it a negative? In addition, the cost of the revenue support grant nationally would have increased by £27 billion, adding 15p in the pound to the basic rate of income tax. That shows what a thoroughly silly question was asked by the hon. Lady.

Estates Renewal Challenge Fund

9. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities were awarded funding under round 1 of the estates renewal challenge fund. [7859]

Mr. Clappison: Eleven local authorities have been awarded funding in the region of £174 million. This will secure improvements to 19,000 homes on 29 needy estates.

Mr. Bellingham: I thank my hon. Friend for that excellent reply. Is he aware that many people in Norfolk are rejoicing at the news of the list of winning bids in the capital challenge pilot scheme? As well as two excellent schemes in Norwich—one of which is worth £2.5 million and the other nearly £4 million—there are two in my constituency. First, there is the North Lynn gateway scheme—where the go-ahead has been given to environmental improvements to the entrance to a school—and secondly, the Hunstanton regeneration scheme. The latter scheme will be most welcome, as it will regenerate the waterfront and many other parts of the town. Are those not examples of the Government listening to local people and going ahead with environmental improvements to their communities?

Mr. Clappison: It is good news that those environmental improvements are taking place in North Lynn and Hunstanton in my hon. Friend's constituency. I am sure that he, too, will be pleased that there are to be substantial improvements in the 29 needy estates that are in some of the most rundown areas of the country, as well as improvements for tenants in the form of repairs and maintenance.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Minister agree that it is gross hypocrisy to talk about improving conditions on a small number of selected estates when the Budget savagely cut housing investment and, as a result, condemned hundreds of thousands of tenants throughout the country to live in substandard housing? If the Government are really serious about improving housing conditions, why do they not release the £5 billion of capital receipts?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. He should applaud transfers of housing that bring about repairs and maintenance for tenants, especially when they take place in the most needy areas. He should make it clear whether he is promising more spending on housing, or saying that cuts should fall elsewhere. If he will not, will he explain how he would go about funding housing? We have made it clear that we want there to be transfers, and all the improvements that they bring, and that we want to bring in private capital alongside public expenditure and so get greater value for money. We have heard nothing from the hon. Gentleman, and that failure is becoming increasingly widely recognised.

Councillors (Allowances)

10. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers he has to control the level of allowances which local authority councillors award themselves. [7860]

Mr. Gummer: To ensure that local people can see what their council is doing, we have required local authorities to publish annually the amount of allowances paid to each of their councillors.

Mr. Garnier: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the leader of Leicester city Labour group, aided and abetted by his Labour cronies, and without any proper consultation with the taxpayers of that city, has raised his allowance from £4,000 a year to more than £27,000 a year? What price local democracy under Labour?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. and learned Friend may have noticed that it appears that, earlier this year, there was a 600 per cent. increase in the allowances paid to councillors in Leicester, yet this very morning representatives from Leicester were in the office of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration complaining that they do not have enough money to meet their bills for essential services. It does seem that Leicester ought to look at its priorities.

Mr. Sheerman: The Secretary of State will know that, fairly recently, in the name of improving democracy, we in this House voted a substantial increase in our pay. Is it not about time that, to ensure the quality of candidates from all parties that come forward for local government, we pay local councillors a decent rate? Is not that good for local democracy? Is it not harmful that the cheapjacks on the Conservative Back Benches ask questions like that? Does it not undermine local democracy and the real effort being made by Labour councillors up and down this land?

Mr. Gummer: I happen to think that real effort is made by councillors of all sorts, not only Labour councillors up and down this land. [HON. MEMBERS: "He said that."] The hon. Gentleman specified Labour councillors up and down this land, exhibiting the usual bias that he brings to the House. Many of us did not vote for that increase in pay. Furthermore, we are talking about 600 per cent. increases in the allowances paid to councillors who then complain that the taxpayer does not provide them with enough money to carry through services. If councillors ran enabling councils, instead of trying to run everything themselves, they could do the work far more effectively and in a great deal less time.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, apart from publishing the amounts of councillors' allowances, local authorities should publish the amount that they have written off to benefit the political friends of councillors?

Mr. Gummer: Transparency in these matters is very important, but what is most important is that, when councils insist on increasing the amount paid to their councillors, they should recognise that those sums are supposed to be honoraria for help, not payments. One of the distinguishing features of local councils is supposed to be that they are run by people who do it while also doing another job.

Minerals Planning Guidance

11. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to review minerals planning guidance note 3; and if he will make a statement. [7861]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Minerals planning guidance note 3 was fully reviewed and revised in July 1994. There are currently no plans to revise it again.

Mr. Barnes: Is the Minister aware that there are 15 opencast operations or applications in the north-east corner of Derbyshire, which are ripping its guts out, in addition to historic operations in the area? Should not mineral planning guidance notes take into account the cumulative aspects of the matter? They are supposed to take into account current and future operations, but they take no account of historic operations and they should do so. There should also be an investigation in north-east Derbyshire to establish whether the cumulative aspects of the matter are being taken into account.

Mr. Jones: That is incorrect. We take the strong view that local authorities, in drawing up plans for their areas, should include the criteria by which they will judge planning applications. They should, if appropriate, include the cumulative effect of such applications. It is entirely the responsibility of Derbyshire county council and the hon. Gentleman's local authority to ensure that applications are processed in the right way.

Mr. Nigel Evans: I accept the need for minerals for construction and road building, but does my hon. Friend accept that the guidelines need to be sufficiently flexible to reflect the changing needs and priorities of certain areas—such as tourism in the Ribble valley—to ensure that the local authority has sufficient protection to be able, in certain circumstances, to turn down certain planning applications from companies in my constituency?

Mr. Jones: Authorities' local plans should be flexible, so that they can respond to changing circumstances. As my hon. Friend knows, every planning application must be dealt with on its merits, and if the merits—or disbenefits—change, that is a material consideration for the local authority to consider.

Ms Ruddock: Is the Minister aware that the test of environmental acceptability in the revised guidance of which the Secretary of State today boasted is proving a farce because the Coal Industry Act 1994 requires sites to be sold on the best available terms? Does he agree that environmental criteria should be included in "best available terms" and, if they are, can he explain why the ecologically important site of Shilo north in Broxtowe has been sold to RJB Mining in preference to the conservation bid made by that local authority in the interests of the community?

Mr. Jones: "Best available terms" must necessarily reflect the obligations that any owner has to make environmental improvements or to accept environmental controls over what it does, and the need to take a risk on the likelihood or otherwise of gaining planning permission for any extensions. As there is no presumption in favour of development in green areas, it would be very difficult for such an applicant to prove a case unless the benefits considerably outweighed the environmental disadvantages.

Business Rates

12. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the level of business rates charged to small companies, partnerships and sole traders. [7862]

Sir Paul Beresford: As my hon. Friend is aware, the Government have taken steps to ensure the freezing of the business rate for small businesses for the coming financial year.

Mr. Fabricant: Is my hon. Friend aware that many villages—such as Pipe Ridware in my constituency—in which small businesses are located will benefit from that? Is it not the case that about £100 million has been made available from the Budget for that purpose? Was my hon. Friend shocked, as I was, that when the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Dr. Wright) asked a question earlier, he did not thank my hon. Friend for the £4.5 million capital challenge grant from his Department which will safeguard 1,100 jobs in Burntwood?

Sir Paul Beresford: Some people are ungracious in the extreme, but my hon. Friend is right. Small businesses in towns and villages are congratulating the Government on the move.

Mr. Pike: Recognising that the Government have had to take measures to minimise the effect of next year's revaluation on small businesses, and remembering that the legislation that introduced the national business rate was the second part of the Thatcher legislation that launched the ill-fated poll tax, will the Government now admit that that was the worst flagship ever launched and that they should now scrap all that legislation?

Sir Paul Beresford: That is a bit rich coming from the hon. Gentleman, who, when we were discussing this matter in Committee yesterday, talked about the business rate returning to the local authority setting. I know that he was trying to goad me, but he should recognise the damage that Labour-controlled local authorities have done in the past. Consider previous rates: Camden set a business rate for small businesses of 229.2p; Westminster set a rate of 171p—a dramatic drop; and one of my better-known favourites, Wandsworth, set a rate of 161.1p. We can see in some parts of central London the damage that business rates set by Labour-controlled local authorities did. Shop after shop in Tottenham Court road is shut because of Camden council.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 December. [7881]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mrs. Fyfe: Has the Prime Minister seen today that another London hospital has shut its doors to emergency patients? At the Victoria geriatric unit in Glasgow, a notice asks staff to think cost-effectively and limit incontinence wipes to two per person. Does the Prime Minister still maintain that the NHS is safe in Tory hands?

The Prime Minister: Not only is the NHS safe, it is improving its service day by day. What the hon. Lady missed out of her litany were the 70 or so improvements in primary health care announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. The hon. Lady knows that not only is the health service improving, but resources for the health service are improving both globally and per patient.

Q2. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 December. [7882]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend recall reports from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development some years ago, when inflation was 27 per cent., there was disaster everywhere and the International Monetary Fund had to be called in? Will he contrast those reports with the latest OECD report, which says that this country is set for record economic expansion and more growth than for 30 years, which will benefit the health service and everyone else? Would not all that be put at risk by uncosted Labour promises if the Labour party was ever elected to office—which it will not be?

The Prime Minister: A few weeks ago, the shadow Chancellor dismissed the economic improvements in this country as propaganda. The OECD report published today shows how inaccurate he is. It says that prospects for achieving sustained output, growth and low inflation are the best for 30 years. The OECD now expects the UK's growth rate next year—and the year after next—to be the highest in the group of industrial nations, easily outstripping Japan, Germany, France and the United States. It also forecasts falling unemployment on the back of that. There is no doubt that it is a glowing report. It is the best OECD report that this country has received for very many years, and it shows the best economic prospects that we have had for very many years.

Mr. Blair: Will the Prime Minister now tell us specifically by what date the European beef ban will be lifted?

The Prime Minister: I note, first, that the right hon. Gentleman does not deny the OECD report and does not wish to comment on it.

The right hon. Gentleman knows that the beef ban will be lifted by our European partners and that I cannot tell him precisely what date that will be. We have taken measures for the ban to be lifted, and I shall seek the lifting of the ban progressively as soon as possible. We are now in the process of discussing a certified herd scheme that would cover the whole of the United Kingdom and from which we hope to see a progressive lifting of the ban.

Mr. Blair: If the Prime Minister wants to ask me questions, I shall be happy to swap roles whenever he wishes to call the general election.

The Prime Minister's answer on beef is extraordinary. Does he not recall that, after the Florence summit, he came to the Dispatch Box and said that he had a firm agreement that, if we did certain things, the ban would be lifted, and that the timetable was in our hands, not Europe's? [HON. MEMBERS: "He did not say that."] He certainly did say that. He said that, at the end of November, the ban would be lifted on scientific evidence. Is it not clear that he had no such agreement; that there was no guarantee that the ban would be lifted; that the timetable is in the hands of the veterinary committee; that he cannot give us a date; and that the lifting of the ban was not proceeded with on scientific evidence? Can the Prime Minister tell us the date by which the ban will be lifted, if the Florence agreement holds?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is misleading the House.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sure that the Prime Minister does not mean the words that he has just said. I must ask him to withdraw them. No hon. Member misleads the House.

The Prime Minister: No doubt innocently, the right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the situation on beef—and not for the first time. The conditions that are necessary for the scientific committee to consider lifting the beef ban depend on actions that we take. That is correct. Among those actions is the selective cull. That is correct. As I reminded the right hon. Gentleman yet again yesterday—not for the first time—the selective cull was delayed because of the extra evidence on maternal transmission and because the over-30-months scheme was larger than anybody had supposed. The position now—

Dr. Strang: Who are you kidding?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is the Opposition's agriculture spokesman and he is supposed to know. If he does not know, I understand why the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) does not know. We now know who is providing the information that the right hon. Gentleman misunderstands. We are now seeking to obtain progressive lifting by means of the certified herd scheme, as we have set out, on more than one occasion, to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Blair: So the Prime Minister cannot give us a date for lifting the ban. [Interruption.] The Government gave us a date before, they did not honour it and they cannot give us a new one. I have just checked in Hansard, and the Prime Minister specifically said that the date for lifting the ban was in the hands of the British Government. If that is correct, why can he now not give us a date? The answer is that it is not in his hands. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may shout, but the truth is that BSE is a symbol of the Government—they are incompetent, incapable and can never be trusted.

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman reads what I said a few moments ago, he will understand why his third question is absurd, as was his prepared sound bite. It is no good his trying to fix facts. He cannot fix polls, as we have seen, and he should not try to fix facts.

Mr. David Atkinson: Does my right hon. Friend recall the question that I put to him almost exactly a year ago about the failure of most computer systems in this country and throughout the world to recognise the year 2000, which will have enormously damaging consequences, not least for British business? Does he accept that, one year on, widespread ignorance of and inaction in response to the problem remain? Will he now give serious consideration to my ten-minute Bill, the Companies (Millennium Computer Compliance) Bill, which would do much to ensure that the computer systems of British businesses will be safe in three years' time?

The Prime Minister: I shall undertake to ensure that my hon. Friend's ten minute Bill is examined carefully by my right hon. Friends. The underlying problem to which my hon. Friend refers is very serious, and we do not intend to leave it without action.

Mr. Ashdown: The Prime Minister can huff and puff as much as he likes, but speak to any farmer in this country and they will say that the BSE fiasco tells us all we need to know about this Government: they dither at home, posture abroad, surrender at the end and blame it all on Europe. Does the Prime Minister realise that the anti-European opinion in his Cabinet, on his Back Benches and overwhelmingly among his candidates throughout the country means that, far from fighting for Britain in Europe in 1997, the Conservatives will become Britain's out-of-Europe party in 1997?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman has a long tradition of being very supportive of the European Union. After all, some time ago he said:

"We want Ministers to make decisions in public and without single nation vetoes".

The right hon. Gentleman would surrender that. He has also said that he does "not believe in the sovereignty of Parliament"

as far as the European Union is concerned. The hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) has written to my right hon. Friend the Minister Without Portfolio claiming that his party does not want a united states of Europe. I find that very odd, as the same hon. Gentleman said some time ago:

that is, Liberal—

"ideas on Europe are totally illiberal . . . we want to create a bureaucratic and centralist nightmare".

Not only are the Liberals unable to agree among themselves, they cannot even agree with themselves.

Sir Roger Sims: Is not today's White Paper, to which my right hon. Friend referred earlier, to be welcomed, as it both extends the facilities available to patients and increases the involvement in primary care of health care professionals such as nurses and pharmacists? Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that additional resources will be given to the national health service to develop the White Paper proposals?

The Prime Minister: We have set out a commitment for additional resources over and above inflation for the national health service throughout the next Parliament—a commitment that we have honoured during the past 17 years and which other parties seem unable to match. My hon. Friend is right about the importance of primary care services. The proposals announced today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will lead to better general practitioner premises, a wider range of services available closer to home, better training for GPs and other staff, expansion of nurse prescribing, more funds for research into primary health, and much else besides. It is a very significant advance in the march towards far better primary health care.

Official Visits

Q3. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Prime Minister when he intends to pay an official visit to Wakefield. [7883]

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Has the Prime Minister had the opportunity to study the correspondence that I sent him last week concerning my constituent, Mr. Wayne Hood of Wakefield, who was recently sent to prison for four years for the attempted murder of his former foster parent who seriously sexually abused him over a seven-year period during his childhood and adolescence? Bearing in mind the fact that the foster parent has been gaoled for seven years for those serious offences against Mr. Hood and other children in his care, will the Prime Minister support the call for a review of Mr. Hood's sentence? While I do not condone Mr. Hood's actions, has he not been treated very harshly by the courts in view of his background and circumstances?

The Prime Minister: I have seen the correspondence that the hon. Gentleman sent to me, and I am grateful to him for giving me notice of his question. I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's deep interest and concern about this case. I made inquiries, and I understand that an application for leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal has been lodged. The hon. Gentleman will know that, in those circumstances, it is not appropriate for me to say anything further now. I believe that that is the correct way to pursue the matter. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to discuss it with me privately, I will be happy to see him.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the people of Wakefield would not want us to leave this year without congratulating Damon Hill on winning the sports personality of the year award? Would not they be amazed to know that he achieved that without an audience participation unit?

The Prime Minister: I should like to congratulate Damon Hill on his success. The whole country took a great deal of pleasure in his many wins throughout the year. He is a very deserving winner of that poll. In the spirit of amity at Christmas, I shall not respond to the latter part of my hon. Friend's question.

World Trade Organisation Conference

3.30 pm

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): I should like to make a statement to the House on the outcome of the first ministerial conference of the World Trade Organisation held in Singapore last week, at which I led the United Kingdom's delegation.

The Government are convinced that free trade offers unparalleled opportunities to enhance prosperity, not only in the United Kingdom, but around the world. Accordingly, we had three objectives for the conference. The first was to agree a substantial programme to carry forward trade liberalisation in the WTO, including, in particular, forward-looking work on trade facilitation, standards, Government procurement, tariffs and investment, which is a key priority for British business.

The second objective was the completion, in outline, of an information technology agreement aimed at the progressive elimination of tariffs on information technology products, with the widest possible participation by WTO member countries. The third was to make real progress on negotiations to liberalise basic telecommunications, which are scheduled to conclude by February 1997. I am glad to say that I have positive news to report on all three objectives.

There is now provision in the WTO's new work programme for many of the United Kingdom's priorities for tackling the trade barriers that still remain outwith WTO rules. On trade facilitation—or the simplification of import and export procedures, which was a British-led initiative—the programme agreed opens the way to new co-operative work between the WTO and other relevant international organisations to reduce burdens on trade. Those procedures currently add some 10 per cent. to the costs of goods in international trade.

On Government procurement, all WTO member countries will now engage in work on transparent procedures, which should help to open a much wider range of opportunities for exporters and save taxpayers' money around the world, by encouraging more competition in public tendering procedures. That is an important step forward. Again, it was a British-inspired initiative.

On technical product standards, the way is open under the WTO's work programme to increase co-operation between the WTO and international standards organisations so as to concentrate work on priorities that are of real practical importance to trade, and to reinforce the use of international standards.

The Singapore ministerial declaration contains a renewed commitment to the progressive liberalisation and elimination of tariffs and non-tariff barriers generally. A working group will be established to look at the range of issues that arise in the relationship between trade and investment. That is vital to Britain as the world's second largest overseas investor.

A working group will be established to study the relationship between trade and competition policy. We will want to promote the development of competition regimes in countries that do not have them, and to reduce any barriers to markets created by anti-competitive practices.

The biggest immediate trade liberalisation achievement of the week was an agreement in principle to phase out tariffs on a wide range of information technology products by the year 2000. Our aim is maximum country participation and maximum product coverage. The deal was instigated by the European Union and the United States, but was joined by 11 other countries. Overall, the participating countries represent about 83 per cent. of world trade. Definitive conclusion of the agreement is scheduled for 1 April 1997, subject to increasing country coverage to the equivalent of 90 per cent. of world trade and reaching satisfactory final arrangements on the staging of tariff reductions in the run-up to the year 2000.

The value of this to Britain will be significant. It will eliminate tariffs facing British exporters in a number of key overseas markets; it will reduce the cost of vital IT products which we import, such as semiconductors; and it will stimulate new growth and enterprise, as there is no British industry that does not rely on IT products in its operations. In money terms, the value to the United Kingdom is estimated at £250 million on tariff cuts alone, setting aside the enormous potential of increased global trade in information technology. As the US trade representative has said, this is

An important deal was also agreed between the European Union and the United States on the further elimination of tariffs on spirits. That is very good news indeed for our drinks industry, particularly the Scotch whisky industry. Specifically, the EU and the US have agreed to accelerate the elimination of their tariffs on the import of whisky, brandy and other brown spirits. At the same time, they have also agreed to eliminate their tariffs on the import of gin, vodka and other white spirits over the next five years.

Good progress was also made in the on-going WTO negotiations to open up world telecommunications markets. As the House knows, Britain has benefited greatly from having one of the most liberal telecommunications markets in the world. Nine countries pledged new or better offers, in addition to the 34 commitments already made. That has improved the prospects of an agreement by February 1997, which could be worth $20 billion per annum to Britain by the year 2010.

The United Kingdom was also influential at the conference in helping to keep the WTO focused on trade liberalisation issues. Ministers agreed that economic growth and development, fostered through increased trade and trade liberalisation, offered the best prospect of raising labour standards. The relevant passage in the ministerial declaration also makes it clear that the International Labour Organisation is the competent body to deal with labour standards, while noting that the existing limited collaboration between the WTO and ILO secretariats will continue. In practice, that means that, as has been the case for some time, the two secretariats will send observers to each other's meetings. I am sure that that approach, through trade liberalisation, offers the right way forward, rather than an approach based on sanctions or other restrictions.

In this context, the United Kingdom also pushed hard for specific market access commitments for products from the least developed countries. Those countries account for only about 0.4 per cent. of world trade. I therefore welcome the plan of action agreed by Ministers, which aims to provide more favourable and predictable access for the exports from those countries.

I am happy to say that for the United Kingdom and, I believe, for the world as a whole, the conference was a substantial success. It has enhanced the authority of the World Trade Organisation, and the overriding importance of reducing barriers to trade on a multilateral basis. It represents an important step towards the British Government's objectives of launching a new round of trade negotiations before the end of the century and, in the longer term, achieving global free trade.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Does the President of the Board of Trade understand that Labour Members find some of the things in his statement very welcome? On some issues that he set out before he went to the conference, there is common ground across the House. We certainly welcome, for example, the simplification of procedures for importers and exporters, the extension of greater transparency in tendering for public purchasing, the work on achieving greater conformity in international standards, where Britain has a great potential competitive advantage, and the potential establishment of the working groups, which will consider a range of issues arising between trade and investment and trade and competition. Labour Members certainly share the Government's view that those are all desirable means of progress.

We would identify one issue of slight concern. We might be anxious if we thought that there had been the convergence of view on core labour standards that the President of the Board of Trade has identified, but as it appears that everyone is claiming victory on that front—I understand that Commissioner Brittan said that the discussions had been a breakthrough in dialogue on these matters—clearly there is a certain amount of common ground there and not necessarily a clear victory for the Government's view, as the President sought to suggest.

The President raised the issue of liberalisation of telecommunications, which we welcome in the context of the WTO talks. We want it to be achieved through completion of the single market, to which my party is committed. Will he confirm a report that companies such as IBM are suggesting that, if liberalisation produces real savings, they may be channelled specifically towards research and development? That would be an interesting and useful breakthrough and I would be grateful if he could cast any light on the matter.

I notice that the President has identified three principal priorities, but he also mentioned a fourth issue: piracy and intellectual copyright, which, in his speech last week, he identified as costing consumers in the European Union about £2 billion. Was anything discussed at the conference that may cast light on progress on that issue?

Finally, the President of the Board of Trade has mentioned his proposals for a new international round of trade negotiations. Again, reports suggest that there was perhaps not as fulsome a welcome for the notion of a full-scale, all-singing, all-dancing new trade round as he might have hoped. Again, will he clarify the Government's position in this respect because, clearly, although we are all anxious to have constructive developments along those lines, a whole new trade round is a slightly separate matter?

Mr. Lang: I thank the right hon. Lady for her welcome for various matters that I have reported to the House, in particular the improvement in import and export procedures, trade facilitation, the transparency of Government procurement, progress on standards and the working groups that are to be established on investment and competition. I agree that those are all major steps forward in the existing programme's agenda and that they set up the new work programme that the Government were keen to see.

On core labour standards, the right hon. Lady referred to other countries claiming a breakthrough. The declaration's conclusion agreed to the primacy of the International Labour Organisation as the body responsible for these matters, to support basic standards throughout the world—as all countries that have signed the United Nations convention on human rights do—to recognise that trade liberalisation helps to improve working standards in poor countries, and to confirm that there is no contemplation of any attack on developing countries.

There was no reference to a future work programme or to future continuing activity in the WTO on the matter. There was no mention of sanctions. There was a commitment only to the continuance of existing contacts. That agreement, as enshrined in the declaration, conforms exactly to the Government's position. I warmly welcome that sensible and realistic conclusion, which was widely supported by most countries throughout the world.

I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for her welcome for progress in the telecommunications sector and I agree about the desirability of further liberalising the single market in this respect. Indeed, considerable progress in working up the EU's offer has taken place in Europe. For example, Spain has brought forward its offer on liberalisation by several years.

On the question of savings and their application specifically to research and development, that is essentially a matter for the market, but I have not the slightest doubt that the extensive investment in R and D that takes place in the telecommunications industry will be enhanced. We are talking about additional telecoms traffic worldwide of $1,000 billion by the year 2010, and the United Kingdom's share of that is likely to exceed $20 billion. Therefore, if an agreement can be achieved by the middle of February next year, it will be a major breakthrough for the extremely well liberalised telecoms industry in the UK.

With regard to intellectual property rights, the conclusion was to reinforce the work already agreed in the Uruguay round. That will continue to be a high priority for the British Government.

Finally, on the right hon. Lady's question about a full trade round, there is—on the contrary—a growing commitment within the WTO membership to recognise the benefits that trade liberalisation brings. Through the agreement of the working programme, we are already moving de facto towards a new trade round, and I anticipate that at the next meeting of the WTO or the one after that, it should be possible to achieve an absolute commitment to make further progress in that respect.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and excellent progress in this crucial area. What impact will that have on EC regulations and directives? As he has made such excellent progress in world liberalisation, do we need fewer EC regulations, because they are subsumed by the global progress?

Mr. Lang: Yes, I am happy to give my right hon. Friend that assurance. I mentioned, for example, the progress on telecommunications liberalisation achieved in working up the EU offer. In the other areas to which I referred—the working groups on investment, competition, Government procurement, standards and trade facilitation, which was one of the British-inspired initiatives—there will in every respect be an opportunity to dispense with unnecessary regulations. The trade facilitation initiative in particular enables us to tackle what the United Nations conference on trade and development—UNCTAD—has identified as about 10 per cent. of the value of trade in goods, so there are major opportunities ahead.

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): May I too welcome the progress that has been made, particularly in information technology, telecoms and—as I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) would want me to say—spirits tariffs. What discussion was there at Singapore about the environment? Does not conventional trade liberalisation often lead to environmental damage? Is it not important that we should cease to cling to the argument that economic growth must come before action to protect the environment? How does the President assess the environmental cost in relation to the benefit of any increase in trade that may result from the conference?

Mr. Lang: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. That is an important topic, on which some progress, albeit limited, was made at Singapore. The WTO committee on the environment and trade had made a useful start, and has now been made a permanent body, so environmental issues are increasingly recognised. My own view is that free trade and environmental protection are mutually supportive. Indeed, environmental protection creates a number of major trading opportunities for countries such as the United Kingdom, which is advanced in the provision of equipment and technology for reducing environmental pollution. This is an important area, on which there is still more work to be done.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): Has there been any progress with Japan, following the WTO ruling on whisky duty? My right hon. Friend's interest in whisky, and mine, is much deeper than just superficial.

Mr. Lang: As my hon. Friend says, the WTO ruled in favour of the European Union in that dispute. I am glad to say that the Japanese Government have accepted the ruling. They are still in negotiation with the EU and the United States and Canada about the final terms of the resolution of the dispute, but I am optimistic that it will be resolved shortly. Thus, in addition to the EU-US deal on spirits, there is also promise in the negotiations on the taxation of whisky in Japan. I hope that that double measure of good cheer will cheer my hon. Friend up as we approach the festive season.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): Did the conference take a position on the trade in armaments with oppressive regimes, such as Burma and Indonesia?

Mr. Lang: No. So far as I am aware, the trade in arms was not discussed at the conference.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that more than half our total export earnings come from countries outside the European Union, and that we run a large balance of payments surplus with those non-EU countries in the so-called invisible trade sector—that is, financial services and investment? If that is so, will my right hon. Friend continue his laudable efforts to liberalise that sector of trade, which would have a much more direct and beneficial influence on our future trade and prosperity than any other project, such as handing over our economic sovereignty to a European central bank?

Mr. Lang: I am not sure that all my hon. Friend's figures are correct. Our trade with Europe is about 60 per cent. of the total. However, our trade with countries outwith Europe, particularly the far east, is expanding very rapidly, and there are major long-term opportunities there. Moreover, we have a balance of trade surplus on the current account figures with every continent except Europe. To that extent, therefore, I can give my hon. Friend some encouragement. We have a global surplus in services of £6 billion, which I think applies in every continent in the world. That is extremely encouraging.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that there is another story to be told? All the world trade liberalisation in which the Tory Government have taken part in the past 17 years has resulted in deregulation, in BSE, in longer working hours and in all the other problems that have arisen. Since 1983, it has resulted in a balance of payments deficit; and, in the past six years, under this Government, it has resulted in the doubling of the national debt, to £380 billion. It sounds like a barmy road to me. In the best days of Parliament, in the years after 1945, we had full employment, shorter working hours and regulations. We also had a surplus in our balance of payments. The net result of the Government's proposals is a move towards slave labour economies and towards the lowest common denominators, instead of searching for the highest common factor.

Mr. Lang: Clearly old Labour is still alive and living on the Opposition Benches. I do not recognise the picture painted by the hon. Gentleman. The policies pursued by the Government, including trade liberalisation, have created several years of falling unemployment, which is now more than 3 per cent. below the European average; record-breaking inward investment; rising manufacturing output, creating 150,000 jobs in the past three years; our exports beating records worldwide; and recognition by the OECD that the UK will have the fastest growth rate, not only in the European Union but, next year, among the G7.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I express my appreciation for my right hon. Friend's good work in Singapore and for his encouraging statement? But would not we all be much more encouraged if the objective of total elimination of tariffs and of non-tariff barriers were matched by progress in that sphere by the European Union, most notably in agricultural products? Is not such progress especially desirable as the communiqué set as a further objective special access for less-developed countries, many of which have large agricultural sectors?

Mr. Lang: I agree with my hon. Friend; it is an important subject which must be tackled further. Under the Uruguay round, the situation is due to be reviewed in 1999. Some progress was made in Singapore towards performing work of an analytical and reporting nature, which will be useful in enabling work on further liberalisation of agriculture to occur with more speed in 1999. I hope that the European Union will be a full-hearted participant in that work.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Further to the question of the environment, will the Secretary of State tell us how he now hopes that progress will be made on environmental issues in further negotiations? Specifically, is he confident that such agreements as the Montreal protocol on chlorofluorocarbons, the Basle agreement on hazardous waste, and the London convention on international trade in endangered species will not fall foul of rules on world trade? Does he realise that it is important that we protect the environment, but that we are now putting that goal in conflict with further trade liberalisation?

Mr. Lang: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Those are important issues, and the establishment now of a permanent committee on the environment will enable progress on the issues that he identified and on many others. The United Kingdom Government will be keen a participant in that work.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Does my right hon. Friend agree that—in contrast to the remarks particularly of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)—the United Kingdom has gained tremendously by inward investment in telecommunications by liberalising the market and encouraging competition? The United States telecommunications market remains in many respects relatively protectionist and at best favours reciprocal agreements. Has progress been made on opening up that market to British products and services?

Mr. Lang: I agree with the premise of my hon. Friend's question. Considerable progress has been made. The final date for an agreement is 15 February 1997. No doubt a great deal of intensive negotiation will be needed then. Provided the will exists—I believe that it does—there must be at least a reasonable prospect of the United States being a full-hearted participant in a final deal. The United States also stands to benefit enormously from the liberalisation of that massive industry.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Like others, I appreciate the President of the Board of Trade's upbeat report on the conference, particularly his welcome for the plan of action for more favourable and predictable access for exports from less-developed countries. Was there much discussion about the imbalance between the costs of production in such countries and the high price of the same goods in developed countries? For example, it might cost £1 to manufacture trainers that sell for £40, £50 or £60 here or in another developed country. Where is the money going? How much can be poured back to help those developing countries to educate their work force?

Mr. Lang: I have considerable sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's point. In the European Council I pressed for recognition of the desirability of accepting zero tariffs on goods from the 48 least developed countries in the world, which account for 0.4 per cent. of world trade. There was not general agreement in the European Union or elsewhere on that. However, I am glad to say that we were able to make progress on giving technical assistance to the least developed countries, on helping them find access to markets, and on assuring them that there is no question, through trade and labour standards or other such measures, of penalising those areas in which they have a competitive advantage. We are keen to help them to exploit their competitive advantages, gain access to our markets and acquire the technology that will enable them to strengthen their position.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I believe that the United Kingdom is already the most open advanced economy in the world, exporting more per head than the Japanese and more in total than all the Asian tigers put together. If those facts are broadly correct, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that, while he holds his post—which I hope he will do for a long time—he will continue to lean against any tendency towards regional mercantilism among our partners on the continent, and will ensure that the World Trade Organisation has all the necessary powers and competencies to stop those tendencies gaining ground?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree with the premise of his question. I also agree with the sentiments that he expressed. The WTO has a committee to deal with regional issues. There has been a substantial increase in the number of regional groupings. There must be a danger that some of those groupings enjoy a distortion of trade and that others are protectionist and inward-looking. It is our purpose to ensure that regional groupings have a multilateral outlook and form building blocks towards the multilateral free trade agenda recognised by the WTO.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton–under–Lyne): The right hon. Gentleman talked about maximum country co-operation. We all agree with that. Is he aware that China—a country that will play a greatly increasing role in world trade—is not in the World Trade Organisation? What is the right hon. Gentleman's view on the admission of China and encouraging it to enter the WTO?

Mr. Lang: I favour the admission of China, provided that it undertakes to accept the rules and observe them. The WTO already accounts for 90 per cent. of world trade. It has 126 members, but there are also some 30 applicants, of which China is one and Russia is another. I should like those major trading nations, particularly those with massive potential for the next century, to join the WTO, but it is important that they accept the disciplines of the organisation.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): My right hon. Friend and his departmental colleagues deserve congratulation on the leading role that Britain, under their leadership, has played in the success of the Uruguay round of the general agreement on tariffs and trade and on their successes at the WTO conference in Singapore. However, he cannot rest on his laurels, because there is far too much foot-dragging in our regional grouping, the European Union, on providing proper free trade access into our market, especially for developing countries. Will he bear it in mind that countries in Latin America and elsewhere look to Britain to continue to give a lead in pressing for that from inside the European Union?

Mr. Lang: Yes, and developing countries—and the least developed countries—were grateful for the lead that the United Kingdom gave on core labour standards, on opening up our markets and on increasing the access to trade of the least developed countries. We shall continue that work.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): By what margin do the Japanese propose to reduce their impositions on whisky? Was there any discussion of the on-going Libyan sanctions? As a former Scottish Secretary and the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale, the right hon. Gentleman, of all people, knows that there are grave doubts about Lockerbie. Given that the decision-makers in Libya were educated at British universities and technical colleges, is not the damage done by those sanctions to British industry enormous, especially as phase 3 of the great man-made river project is now worth some £10 billion? How is it that the Germans, Italians and South Koreans are trading merrily while British industry is disadvantaged by this American-led policy?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman referred to the D'Amato legislation, which affects Iran and Libya. That was not discussed at the conference. The question of Japanese whisky is still is under negotiation. Japan has yet to reach a final conclusion, but I have indications that the possibility of a substantial reduction in the duty on imported whisky is being contemplated.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid–Staffordshire): Further to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) on the liberalisation of telecommunications, will my right hon. Friend confirm that he will do everything in his power to ensure that British Telecom's acquisition of MCI goes ahead? Would not a single market among WTO members—which, as he said, already accounts for 90 per cent. of world trade—make trading blocs such as the North American Free Trade Agreement and the EU irrelevant?

Mr. Lang: If we achieved global free trade, regional groupings would become irrelevant. That is why it is important to keep the groupings' eyes on the multilateral agenda and not allow them to become Fortress North America or Fortress Europe. I hope that my hon. Friend understands that it is not appropriate for me to comment on the ambitions abroad of British Telecom.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The Secretary of State was rather reticent in his description of the problems of child labour and working conditions. What does he seriously propose to do to eliminate child labour throughout the world by the enforcement of ILO conditions? Is he not concerned about the growing death rate in the economic zones of China and throughout south Asia in the new industries which is caused by appalling working conditions, the lack of trade union rights and health and safety legislation, and the enormous profits that British, North American and European companies make from such exploitation?

Mr. Lang: This country defers to no other in its condemnation of child labour and forced labour. We will continue to support the ILO in its efforts, through its conventions and other work, to rid the world of such activity. The WTO recognised that that was not an issue for it. It accepted the view that was advanced by me and by other countries that the best way to raise living standards in poor countries is to do more trade with them.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Does my right hon. Friend agree that world environmental standards can improve on the back of increased prosperity generated by tariff reduction, which must always remain the primary objective of events such as the Singapore conference, but that such matters should remain on the agenda?

Mr. Lang: Yes, I agree. I believe that at Singapore we made major progress towards reducing those tariffs.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the President recognise that condemnation of child and bonded labour is, in many people's view, wholly insufficient? Why was not the conference prepared to propose specific action to combat that scourge, including measures to assist poor countries to help children from poor families to receive an education rather than working themselves into a premature grave? Bangladesh, for example, is taking such action, and it would be greatly helped by support from the rich western world in its efforts to give its children an education rather than encouraging them into child labour.

Mr. Lang: I am happy to assure the hon. Gentleman that Bangladesh was among the leading countries warmly to welcome the stance of the United Kingdom Government on that issue. Bangladesh and other poor countries receive benefit from the United Kingdom, through our overseas aid programme, and they will receive help through the least-developed countries programme and through the International Labour Organisation, the work of which we support. The WTO is a rules-making body, and if it got involved in trade and labour standards, it would end up making rules that would regulate trade with those countries, impose sanctions and restrict trade. That would be the best way of driving them to even more extreme poverty.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): When the World Trade Organisation recognises the International Labour Organisation, is that the equivalent of the social chapter, so that, as world free trade leads to child and slave labour, the ILO will have to take action to combat such arrangements? If that is so, and we are associated with the recognition of the ILO, will the Government stop slagging it off?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman has got it the wrong way round. Free trade and trade liberalisation increase trade, and increased trade is the best way of raising living standards in poor countries. Living standards have improved dramatically in countless countries in the past 30 or 40 years, not through the imposition of sanctions, regulations, controls, embargoes or moratoriums, but through trade liberalisation. That is the best way forward.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): Is not the evidence of the past few years that trade liberalisation—this is not the first time that it has been suggested—has done absolutely nothing to deal with the problems of child and bonded labour? In fact, the number of child labourers is increasing, not decreasing. If that is the evidence of the past few years, why should we expect further liberalisation to make the situation any better?

Mr. Lang: I do not know what statistics the hon. Gentleman can produce in support of his claim, but in my experience every country that has had liberalised trade and has traded more freely with other countries has raised its living standards at all levels of society. That is the trend, and it is visible in countless countries in the far east which are emerging into modern, highly industrialised economies and providing major markets for British goods into the bargain.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): Will the President reflect on the fact that in his opening statement he did not make a single reference to the environment, unless we were to assume that it was covered by anti-competitive practices? In the face of the evidence from development agencies, as well as environmental organisations, that free trade has brought an acceleration in the rate of environmental exploitation, the exploitation of children, child labour and slavery, does he recognise that there will have to be a re-regulation of some markets if ethical standards are to be imposed on the global trading area?

Will the President also comment on the criticism that is emerging from the developing nations about one aspect that is protected in the WTO agreement: intellectual property rights? At the moment, global corporations have the right to patent genetic lines for seeds, crops, animals and trees—and even for whole tribes—in the developing world.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman will have heard what I said in answer to an earlier question on intellectual property rights, concerning the reinforcement of the arrangements in the Uruguay round.

I did not mention the environment in my opening statement because there were so many items of positive good news to mention that I did not have time to cover everything. Again, as I said in an earlier answer, some positive progress was made on the environment, and we must build on that.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Can the President confirm that the most authoritative recent study shows that child labour has doubled in the past 10 years, particularly in its most odious form of sexual exploitation for business purposes? That is why the United States, third-world Churches, non-governmental organisations and European countries wanted the WTO to discuss the matter. His opposition to that is a mark of shame for our country. Before he hides behind the ILO, will he confirm that it wants the WTO to discuss the matter? Will he also confirm that ILO discussion is meaningless without sanctions and that 18 months ago the Government wanted to withdraw from the organisation? To shelter behind the ILO is pure pre-Christmas hypocrisy.

Mr. Lang: I am not sheltering behind the ILO. The hon. Gentleman makes assertions about figures on child labour without a shred of evidence to support them. Trade liberalisation is raising standards and improving employment conditions in the emerging countries. I am in no doubt about that, and the vast majority of countries that were represented at Singapore shared that view. It is the right way forward, rather than going down the route of imposing sanctions.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): Will the Secretary of State confirm that his statement on tariffs on information components applies equally to finished products and partly assembled units? Will such tariffs act consequentially to provide the transparency that he described? Will they result in changes to tax regimes here, and should we therefore expect a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Given the Secretary of State's statement on the amount of data that will flow through our telecoms systems, does he agree that, should the Geneva discussions on intellectual property rights not reach a fruitful conclusion in the near future, the matter must be a subject of the next trade round?

Mr. Lang: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the issue of intellectual property rights must be carried further. There are substantial advantages to be gained by this country—among others—if measures are better implemented to reduce piracy of intellectual property. The information technology agreement covers such products as computer hardware and software, semiconductors, integrated circuits, passive components, multi-media equipment, and so on. It does not cover consumer electronics. The savings that will flow are from the tariffs on imports and exports, which will flow to the European Union. I do not therefore envisage my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor making an announcement. The reduction in the cost of the products will be beneficial to everybody who uses them as well as those who make them.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The President of the Board of Trade touched lightly on the Uruguay round and the fact that there are so many loose ends yet to be tied up—on agriculture, financial services, maritime services, professional services and anti-dumping among others. Will he confirm that it is important to tie up those loose ends before we move to new multilateral trade negotiations in a few years' time?

Mr. Lang: It is indeed important to tie up those loose ends, conclude what has been agreed and, if possible, make further and faster progress. There was good progress on the built-in programme at Singapore, but we should not preoccupy ourselves with looking backwards to Uruguay, important though that was. We should also be able to focus on the forward momentum that I believe we have with the new work programme and the information technology and telecommunications deals, as well as the prospect of building towards a new round, which I hope will be announced before the end of the century.

Forensic Explosives Laboratory

4.12 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the inquiry undertaken by Professor Caddy into the circumstances and implications of centrifuge contamination in the Forensic Explosives Laboratory at Fort Halstead.

The House will recall that, on 14 May, I announced that I had invited Professor Caddy, who is director of the forensic science institute at Strathclyde university, to undertake an inquiry into the discovery of RDX, a component of Semtex, in the centrifuge at the Forensic Explosives Laboratory. Professor Caddy was asked to report on the general question whether it was likely that contamination could spread from the centrifuge to samples under examination. He was also asked specifically to examine the laboratory's papers on all past cases in which RDX traces were found and a criminal conviction resulted, and to assess the likelihood that contamination might have occurred in those cases, and he was invited to examine the laboratory's procedures in the trace laboratory, and to make recommendations.

I am today publishing in full Professor Caddy's report as a Command Paper. I have also written to Professor Caddy setting out the Government's response to his report. Copies of the report and the response have been placed in the Library.

Before I turn to the substance of the report, I should like to place on record my thanks to Professor Caddy for undertaking the inquiry. The discovery of explosives contamination in the centrifuge was a grave matter, and one that raised serious questions about the reliability of the forensic evidence that had been submitted by the FEL in some serious criminal cases. I therefore decided to commission without delay an independent inquiry into the circumstances in which the contamination occurred and the implications of the discovery.

I was pleased that Professor Caddy, one of our foremost experts in forensic science and a man of considerable experience in forensic explosives matters, agreed to undertake the inquiry. I am grateful to him for completing that important work so promptly, and for submitting a clear and authoritative report. I should also like to thank Mr. James McQuillan, of the Forensic Science Agency of Northern Ireland, and Dr. Douglas Munro, of the United Kingdom accreditation service, whom Professor Caddy invited to assist him in his inquiry.

The key issue on which Professor Caddy was invited to give an opinion was whether it was likely that the centrifuge had contaminated forensic samples. Professor Caddy looked at all the 124 cases covering the period 1988 to March 1996 in which RDX traces were found and from those identified 14 in which such traces formed part of the evidence before the court, and in which a criminal conviction resulted.

Professor Caddy deals with each of those cases in detail in section 7 of his report. His overall conclusion is set out in section 8, in the following terms:

"From this evidence it can only be concluded that the results obtained from all cases remain a true measure of the presence of the explosive RDX and that no contamination of these casework samples arose from the contaminated centrifuge".

I accept Professor Caddy's findings on the key question of contamination. My officials have accordingly written today to the representatives of the 14 individuals in whose cases traces of RDX formed part of the evidence before the court and a criminal conviction resulted. In the letters, they state that I do not consider that the findings of the report necessitate the referral of any of the cases to the Court of Appeal. That does not, of course prevent further representations from being made on behalf of any of those individuals; but on the basis of Professor Caddy's conclusions, I find no grounds for initiating further action in respect of any of these cases.

I shall take this opportunity to correct a minor error of fact in my written answer to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) on 14 May, which was repeated in my statement on the following day. As Professor Caddy has discovered, the centrifuge was brought into service at the FEL in 1988, not in 1989 as was first thought. That does not affect the scope of the inquiry. All cases in which the centrifuge was used were examined by Professor Caddy.

The conclusion that Professor Caddy has reached on the question of contamination does not lead him to minimise the seriousness of the series of omissions that allowed the contamination in the centrifuge in the trace laboratory to remain undetected for so long. He describes that as a "scientific oversight which is unacceptable and is to be much criticised".

Professor Caddy's terms of reference invited him to examine FEL procedures in the trace laboratory and to make recommendations. Section 11 of his report sets out 18 recommendations which, he believes,

"will both increase the effectiveness of the FEL and provide even greater protection from the possibilities of contamination".

He sets that in the context of the overall high standards that he found at the laboratory, concluding that

"the FEL along with the Forensic Science Agency of Northern Ireland are probably two of the world leaders in terms of the analytical procedures employed but especially the quality assurance programmes used to monitor the containment of trace levels of explosive".

Professor Caddy has made 18 recommendations. The Government accept 17 of them in full, and work on all those is already in hand. Of the 18 recommendations, 16 primarily concern changes to existing practices and equipment at the FEL, designed to improve the work environment still further. The Ministry of Defence, which is responsible for the FEL, is already taking forward work to ensure that the recommendations are implemented without delay. Resources will be made available to implement the changes that Professor Caddy proposes at the laboratory.

Two of Professor Caddy's recommendations are somewhat broader in focus and, with your permission, Madam Speaker, I shall say a few words about each of them. I turn first to the only recommendation that the Government do not accept in full. In recommendation 12, Professor Caddy says:

"The initial examination of all incendiary and explosive devices should be the sole prerogative of the two UK forensic science laboratories, FEL and FSANI, working in this area."

The Government agree that this work should normally be carried out at these laboratories—indeed, the great majority already is. But we believe that it would be wrong to remove altogether the discretion on the part of the police to send devices to other laboratories from time to time if there is a sound reason for doing so.

I propose, therefore, to issue guidance to the police recommending that, unless there are sound operational reasons for doing otherwise, they should in future refer all incendiary and explosive devices in Great Britain to the FEL. The Secretary of State for Scotland will issue similar guidance to Scottish forces. In Northern Ireland, the RUC already refers all such work to the FSANI. I have discussed our response to this recommendation with Professor Caddy and he has expressed himself content with it.

Recommendation 18 also deserves special mention. In that recommendation, Professor Caddy states:

"Consideration should be given to the establishment of an Inspectorate of Forensic Sciences as a means of externally and independently monitoring the performance of laboratories in forensic science to the satisfaction of the forensic science community, the legal profession and most importantly the general public."

We accept that recommendation. We shall, indeed, consider whether to establish an inspectorate of the kind that Professor Caddy details in appendix 4 of his report, but I must also have regard to the proposals of the royal commission on criminal justice, which favoured the creation of a forensic science advisory council. Professor Caddy's recommendation implies a system of statutory regulation that is different from and more far-reaching than the approach favoured by the royal commission. I shall now consider both proposals before deciding how to proceed.

In this context, I welcome the proposals that are under consideration to set up a professional body for forensic science. I understand that preliminary meetings have now taken place involving representatives from various forensic science and other organisations. Lord Dainton—the Chairman of the Science and Technology Committee in another place, which reported on forensic science—is leading the initiative as president elect. I believe that this could be a useful initiative, and I shall therefore take a close interest in the progress made.

In summary, Madam Speaker, the Government accept the substance of all Professor Caddy's conclusions and recommendations. We accept in full 17 of his 18 recommendations and have already begun to implement them. We note the professor's conclusion that all the laboratory's analyses, in both case reports and court cases, remain valid. In particular, we note Professor Caddy's key conclusion that the safety of criminal convictions is not in question as a result of the discovery of the contaminated centrifuge. In the light of this, I have decided that the report does not necessitate the referral of any cases to the Court of Appeal.

We are determined to do all we can to ensure that an incident of this kind will never happen again. The FEL has a justifiably high reputation for its experience and for the high standard of its equipment and procedures. Professor Caddy's report does nothing to undermine this position in general, although it is clear that there are lessons which must and will be learned.

I commend Professor Caddy's report, and the Government's response to it, to the House.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): May I first thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy in allowing me time to read Professor Caddy's report? May I also express the thanks of the Opposition to Professor Caddy—described by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) during our exchanges on 15 May as a "distinguished forensic scientist"—for the thoroughness of his work and the independence of mind that he has brought to bear on the report? I also want to place on record our thanks to those who assisted Professor Caddy.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that, although Professor Caddy raised some very important matters of concern—to which I shall refer in a moment—at no point did he question the integrity of our forensic science services or any of their staff? I am sure that the House will be relieved by the central conclusion of the report—that the evidence provided in every case during the period under examination remains valid. The Secretary of State was, however, right to entertain further representations on behalf of the individuals convicted on the evidence once they and their legal advisers have had a chance to consider the report—which, of course, they have not seen at this stage.

However, does the Secretary of State accept that some of the criticism in the report about working practices at the Forensic Explosives Laboratory is very serious? Does he also accept that Professor Caddy's conclusion at section 3.12, that "only serendipity"—a lucky happenstance—brought to light the absence of any testing during and following the installation of the centrifuge, is alarming indeed?

I want to press the Secretary of State on three other points. First, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman acknowledged in his statement, Professor Caddy recommended that all initial examinations of incendiary and explosive devices and other related evidence should be the sole prerogative of the two United Kingdom forensic science laboratories—the Forensic Explosives Laboratory and the Forensic Science Agency of Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State said that he will continue to allow the police to use other laboratories, if there are sound operational advantages in so doing. Does the Secretary of State agree that, given the strength of Professor Caddy's initial recommendations to confine all that work to the FEL and the FSANI, the use of other laboratories should be permitted only if the two main laboratories do not have the capacity at the time to carry out the investigation required by the police?

Secondly, will the Secretary of State accept that Professor Caddy evidently has significant concerns, expressed in section 9.5 of the report, about the way in which the agency status of those two laboratories might "inhibit an open exchange" between the staffs of these laboratories "because of commercial restraints"? Is the Secretary of State satisfied that the commercial restraints of agency status will not get in the way of the need, spelled out in section 9, to increase the intellectual challenge to members of those staffs by their meeting each other and exchanging information?

Thirdly, I want to press the Secretary of State on Professor Caddy's key recommendation to strengthen the independence of the forensic science services generally by establishing an independent inspectorate, which is contained in section 11 of the report and which is his personal recommendation in appendix 4. Does the Secretary of State accept that it is now four years since Professor Dainton called for an independent body to oversee the service and that that was followed by the report of the Royal Commission on criminal justice recommending the establishment of a forensic science advisory council, which proposal was given further backing by the Lord Chief Justice?

Although I accept that there is some difference in the specific proposals, the Secretary of State will accept that there is overwhelming agreement among all those parties that there has to be an independent overseer of the forensic science services. Lord Taylor said more than two years ago that the need for such a body was urgent, so should not an advisory council now be established immediately, initially on a non-statutory basis because of the time that it would take at this stage of this Parliament to enact into law proposals for a statutory inspectorate, although that might well be what is needed?

Will the Secretary of State also accept that the continuing delay in the Government making up their mind about the need for an oversight body must add to the concerns that Professor Caddy expressed in his report? Was not Professor Caddy right to conclude that such an inspectorate or body is necessary "to restore public confidence" to the forensic science community who, in turn, perform such an essential role in our criminal justice system?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the measured tone of his response and for his tribute to Professor Caddy and the work contained in his report. I entirely agree that some of the criticisms in Professor Caddy's report are serious and we intend to take them seriously, as is evidenced by the extent to which we have accepted his recommendations.

On the three specific points raised by the hon. Gentleman, first, I do not intend to limit the circumstances in which the FEL and the FSANI should be used by the police to the one set identified by the hon. Gentleman. I would expect that that would normally be the exceptional circumstance in which those laboratories would not be used, but I am not confident enough of my ability to identify all exceptional circumstances at this stage and would therefore prefer not to be tied down in that way.

On exchanges of information, we accept the recommendation that there should be regular meetings, and of course it is important that nothing should inhibit the quality of those exchanges in so far as they bear on matters of the type discussed by Professor Caddy in his report.

Finally, I accept the importance of reaching a decision soon on how we can best act on the desire of the royal commission and Professor Caddy for an independent voice in relation to forensic science, but the recommendations that they made are significantly different from one another, so I am not attracted by the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that I should set up a non-statutory advisory council immediately. I certainly do not exclude the possibility of proceeding, in the first instance, on a non-statutory basis, but I prefer to consider more fully Professor Caddy's recommendation and its relationship with the royal commission's recommendation, and the further developments such as those that I identified, which are proceeding, before I reach a final view on the matter.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): In commending my right hon. and learned Friend on initiating the report, may I suggest that not only the forensic science community but the public at large should take satisfaction from the report? It will restore the public's confidence in the forensic science system.

Mr. Howard: I entirely agree with that important point. It is not surprising that some anxiety was expressed when those events came to light, when I commissioned the inquiry, but I believe that the public can have confidence in the outcome of Professor Caddy's report; I agree with my hon. Friend and am grateful for his question.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick–upon–Tweed): Does the Home Secretary agree that it will be a relief for all those involved in protecting the public against the bombing campaign that, despite the errors that were made, Professor Caddy has firmly concluded that convictions are not put in doubt by what happened? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise the implicit criticism of resourcing in Professor Caddy's report? How much money will be made available for the management and research resource requirements that Professor Caddy identified?

On independent monitoring, is it not a little odd, as for at least three years the Home Secretary has resisted setting up an advisory council, that he should now use that as a reason for not setting up a statutory inspectorate? Will he at least say that he is committed to setting up a form of independent monitoring, whichever form is eventually chosen?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his first question. Indeed it is a matter of relief that Professor Caddy came to the conclusions that he reached. I do not entirely accept the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion that the report contains what he described as "implicit criticism" of resource inadequacy; but, in answer to his question, we estimate that the cost of implementing Professor Caddy's recommendations is about £500,000, and those resources will be made available.

On the last point, the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion is unworthy. There have been several developments in forensic science since the royal commission reported; they should be fully taken into account. I recognise that there is a strong case for an independent role, and I hope to reach a conclusion on that matter as soon as possible.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): The whole House will be indebted to Professor Caddy for his report. He is a distinguished forensic scientist.

The Home Secretary said that he saw no grounds for referring cases to the Court of Appeal, but he appeared to anticipate that, when legal representatives of convicted people obtain copies of the report, they might seek to go to the Court of Appeal again on the basis of what is in the report. First, as many hon. Members have not had an opportunity to examine the report, will the Home Secretary tell the House why he feels that those people may seek to go to the Court of Appeal again?

Secondly, he will recall that, in a recent case, a senior official in the forensic science service was highly criticised for his lack of qualifications by, I believe, the Lord Chief Justice on appeal. Is that person involved in any of those cases?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman was reading rather too much into my remarks. As I said, I do not believe that any grounds arising out of this report would justify any of the cases concerned being referred to the Court of Appeal. However, I have learnt over a long period not to underestimate the ingenuity of lawyers. I said that it was open to representatives of those involved in those cases to make further representations suggesting that the cases should be referred, and that any such representations would be considered.

I do not have available a specific answer to the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question. I have no reason to suppose that the person to whom he referred was involved, but perhaps I can write to the hon. Gentleman on that matter.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I am not complaining too stridently, but the document to which the Home Secretary referred was not available in the Vote Office shortly before he rose to make his statement; therefore, I do not know what the report says about the crucial Lockerbie evidence, about which there is considerable forensic doubt. I refer to the timing device or, more accurately, the sliver of timing device, which was the subject of considerable controversy both at the Royal Armaments Centre and in the United States, where considerable doubt has been thrown on the findings of Mr. Thurman, not least by Mr. Whitehurst, another expert. Rather than answer off the top of his head, will the Home Secretary write to me in detail about this aspect of crucial forensic evidence in the Lockerbie case? It leads to the involvement of Libyan sanctions, which, as was said in the last statement, are so damaging to British industry.

Mr. Howard: Once the hon. Gentleman has read the report, he may find that the essential point that he raised is covered in it. I am, however, perfectly prepared to write to him to answer his question as best I can. I am not entirely confident whether I shall provide in my reply sufficient detail to satisfy the hon. Gentleman, but I shall do my best.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Having been familiar with Professor Caddy's work over the years, I am happy to accept his conclusion that none of the forensic evidence in any of the cases has been disturbed. However, a number of cases in the not too distant past involved mistakes—or worse—by forensic scientists. Two problems have arisen: one is that an unhealthily close relationship developed between the police and some forensic scientists—in the Guildford case, for example, they were not above rewriting their evidence at the police's suggestion; and the second is that forensic facilities have often not been available to the same extent to defence lawyers, so they have been unable to test the prosecution's propositions. Is the Home Secretary satisfied that both those problems have now been resolved?

Mr. Howard: That matter is, of course, quite beside the matters that gave rise to Professor Caddy's report, and quite beside his report. I have no reason to suppose that defence lawyers do not have adequate facilities to enable them to benefit from forensic science, but that matter is not directly raised as a result of the report.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Those of us who have spent years working in laboratories will have listened to the statement with astonishment. It is basic to any analytical procedure that a test is run first on possible contamination of all the instruments involved. We have heard today of incompetence on a mountainous scale. It is hard to believe that a centrifuge was left in that condition for a prolonged time. Is the contaminant to which the Home Secretary referred the only indicator of the presence of Semtex or are there other indicators? Although it is impossible to argue with the conclusion made by a report that few of us have read so far, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell us for how long that centrifuge was contaminated, and whether RDX is the only indicator of the presence of Semtex?

Mr. Howard: I shall resist the temptation to accept the hon. Gentleman's invitation to go into areas of technical expertise that I do not possess. I am satisfied that, when the hon. Gentleman has had the opportunity to read the report, he will find his concerns fully and more than adequately dealt with. There were serious shortcomings, as Professor Caddy reveals in his report, although I am not sure that they add up to the kind of criticism contained in the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I thank the Home Secretary for his statement and Professor Caddy for his report. Will the Home Secretary comment specifically on the case of John Kinsella, whose name was included in the review even though he was not convicted on the basis of any forensic evidence that suggested that he had been in touch with Semtex? I know that the Home Secretary has been reviewing that case in detail and, I believe, has now received the statements from Pairic MacFhloinn in prison, who has accepted responsibility for the Warrington bombings and who has said, on record and specifically, that my constituent, John Kinsella, had no knowledge of the contents of the holdall with which he was left. Can the Home Secretary add any further comments on the review that he has undertaken, specifically in relation to John Kinsella's case?

Mr. Howard: No, I am afraid that I cannot add anything this afternoon. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the basis on which representations have been made in that case is not connected with the presence of explosives. He is also right to say that representations have been made in that case; they are currently receiving careful attention in the Home Office.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Like many Members, I have not read the report and therefore cannot quarrel with any of its conclusions. In his statement, the Home Secretary accepted the view that there should be some degree of independent examination of the work done by the Forensic Explosives Laboratory, but specifically excluded the sending of samples to any other laboratory for testing. Those two points seem to contradict each other. When does the Home Secretary propose that an independent testing regime will be set up? After all, we have had a shocking exposé from Professor Caddy of serious shortcomings in the laboratory.

Mr. Howard: I think, with respect, that the hon. Gentleman slightly misunderstood what I said. Far from saying that I would not agree to have samples sent to other laboratories, I rejected, in part, one of Professor Caddy's recommendations that samples should be sent only to the FEL and FSANI. The Government's view is that, although that should normally be the case, there are circumstances in which it would reasonable for the police to use other laboratories. I cannot give a specific timetable for my decision on an independent role, but I recognise the need to come to a view on that matter as soon as possible.

BILLS PRESENTED

Sale of Medicines (Young People)

Mr. Paul Flynn presented a Bill to make it unlawful to sell medicinal products to people under the age of sixteen: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 28 February 1997, and to be printed [Bill 63].

Disabled Persons and Carers (Short-Term Breaks)

Mr. Alfred Morris, supported by Ms Liz Lynne, Sir Richard Body, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mrs. Margaret Ewing, Rev. Martin Smyth, Mr. Roger Berry, Mr. Peter Thurnham, Mr. John Heppell, Mr. Ken Eastham, Mr. Harry Barnes and Mr. Tom Cox, presented a Bill to provide for assessments of health and social needs of disabled persons to include assessments of the needs for short-term breaks for the disabled person and any carer: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 24 January 1997, and to be printed [Bill 62].

<2> Pairing Arrangements

4.43 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Has information about the Division last night been a subject of concern for you, in view of the fact that it seems that the Tory Government paired some of the absent Tory Members of Parliament with people on the Labour Benches and doubled them up with people on the Liberal Benches? In other words, they rigged the ballot. In all my 27 years here, I have never heard of anything like that before. It needs a serious investigation, because the Government are in trouble with their lack of a majority and they might do it again and again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): I have to inform the hon. Gentleman that that subject has nothing to do with the Chair.

Abortion (Amendment)

4.43 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend section 1(1) of the Abortion Act 1967 in relation to the grounds on which a pregnancy may be terminated.

It is Christmas and the whole country seems to be immersed in preparations to celebrate that day. It is not a matter for conjecture—Christmas will be celebrated on 25 December and that is the day that the infant Jesus was born. There was an interesting editorial in the Sunday Express this weekend that posed the question of how many people actually think about the real purpose behind the celebration of Christmas. In the same newspaper, there was another excellent article by Mr. Enoch Powell about the issues that are debated in Parliament these days and the nature of our debates. I had the privilege to be present in the Chamber when Enoch Powell moved a similar Bill and I can only lament that, for various reasons, we no longer have such profound debates on fundamental issues. This is the perfect time for the House to spend a little while considering the plight of babies who are never allowed to develop and be born. I refer to abortion.

The House is familiar with the arguments deployed in support of the Abortion Act 1967 when it was originally introduced. The intentions of the Act were clear at the time. My Bill would support that Act in spirit and in practice. Those who support abortion per se explain their views by saying that a woman has a right to choose and they ask what the state does with unwanted babies. Last year, 163,621 abortions were carried out in England and Wales. Did every one of those women choose not to conceive a child? Is it really possible that so many women had abortions because the risk of injury to the physical or mental health of the mother or existing children was greater than if the pregnancies were terminated? To me, that seems beyond comprehension.

The current clinical interpretation of the Abortion Act 1967, in effect, means that any woman can have a termination if she wishes as long as gestation is under 24 weeks. That fact was highlighted in the summer when a healthy twin was aborted for purely social reasons and a senior gynaecologist admitted on BBC Radio 4:

"There is abortion on demand . . . if a woman wants an abortion, she gets one".

Aborting any foetus is contrary to the original intentions of the Abortion Act of some 30 years ago, which was passed to allow abortions only in a restricted number of cases. Furthermore, with increasing evidence of the humanity of the foetus, those abortions raise serious moral and ethical issues.

Section 1(1)(a) of the Abortion Act 1967 provides no yardstick, thus allowing abortion on demand, sometimes quite late in a pregnancy as we saw with the twin who was killed after 16 weeks. In 1979, Sir Ian Percival, then the Solicitor-General, told a Standing Committee that was considering tightening the grounds for abortion that there was bound to be some risk in every continuing pregnancy, which makes nonsense of the law as it stands at present. He was discussing the inclusion of the word "substantially" before the phrase in order to make the test more stringent and more than merely a statistical evaluation.

While the Bill would be only a small improvement, we are still left with the words "risk" and "injury", neither of which are quantified. Having a stitch or two in the cervix could be regarded by some doctors as an injury, but it would hardly justify the killing of the child in the womb. We therefore need to make it clear that both the risk and the injury must be serious.

Evidence is emerging of the long-term damage caused by abortion, not the least of which is the possibility of breast cancer following abortion. Current figures show a 30 per cent. increase in the incidence of breast cancer among women who have had abortions. There is also evidence from all over the world of women suffering years of trauma as a result of abortions that they imagined would be simple procedures and the answer to an immediate problem. Only this month, the British Medical Journal carried a paper on suicide after pregnancy in Finland from 1987 to 1994. The general suicide rate in Finland for that period was 11.3 per 100,000 and the rate associated with birth was significantly lower at 5.9. However, the suicide rate associated with miscarriage was 18.1 and it soared to 34.7 for induced abortion—significantly higher than in the population at large.

Some years ago, Westminster hospital published a research paper about attempted suicides among teenagers in its catchment area. The only significant statistic to emerge was that the suicide rate was seven times greater among girls who had had abortions compared with the control group. That figure increased to nine times greater when compared with teenage girls in the population at large. The research was decried on the ground that it was statistically too small, but I have heard of no follow-up investigation. In 1992, a short-term study published in the British Journal of Psychiatry found that 10 per cent. of women undergoing abortions suffered from psychological damage or trauma.

My Bill would not alter those sections of the Act that allow abortions in order to save the mother's life. It would not alter the sections dealing with grave and permanent injury to the mother or with the handicapped. It would tighten that part of the Act, section 1(1)(a), under which 97 per cent. of abortions are carried out. It would state quite simply that an abortion would be granted only if there was a significant risk to the mother of serious injury and if that risk was substantially greater than the risks inherent in every pregnancy. It would see an end to abortion on demand—which was never the intention of the 1967 Act. It would do what the present laws are meant to do but what they singularly fail to do: protect the woman and the child. I commend the Bill to the House.

4.52 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I rise to oppose the Bill. Abortion is an issue about which many people feel strongly—and it is not difficult to understand why. Some hon. Members hold particularly strong views on the subject and have declared their intention to use every opportunity to raise the issue on the Floor of the House. It is their right to do so, but they should appreciate—and we should remember—that, although they are very vocal, they represent a view that is held by a very small minority.

When a Sunday newspaper commissioned a MORI opinion poll following the controversy about abortions that occurred this summer, it found that 81 per cent. of respondents agreed or tended to agree with the statement:

"It is important for pregnant women to have the right to choose whether or not to continue their pregnancy".

Only 10 per cent. disagreed or tended to disagree and 9 per cent. neither agreed nor disagreed or had no opinion on the matter. The great majority of people in this country accept that abortion is regrettable but sometimes necessary.

Perhaps most people feel that way because they are sympathetic to the plight of women with problem pregnancies and they have some sense of what it might mean to force a woman to bear a child when she believes, and her doctors agree, that she could not cope. It is all very well for Members of Parliament to hold the strong view that abortion should not be allowed when a foetal abnormality is detected. They have the right to propose legislation that would prohibit such abortions. However, when we discuss such measures we should remember that we, personally, would not have to live with the consequences if the law were so amended.

It is the women denied abortion and their families who would suffer the consequences of such a restriction. Their lives—not ours—would be profoundly changed by the need to care for a child with a serious disability. In many cases, the other children in the family would suffer most. Organisations such as Support Around Termination for Foetal Abnormality, which provides counselling and assistance for those whose pregnancies are affected, know how important the option of abortion is. They know that the choice of abortion is valued even by those who choose not to take it.

Most abortions in this country are performed because the pregnancy is unwanted in circumstances where two doctors agree that it would be damaging to the mental wellbeing of the woman if she were forced to continue it. They are the abortions that some hon. Members are particularly keen to prohibit. But have they thought about what it would mean in practice? Have they thought about what it would really mean for a woman to bear a child that she desperately does not want?

Contraception is not fail-safe. Organisations such as the Birth Control Trust remind us frequently that about a third of pregnancies are conceived by women who say that they were using contraception when they became pregnant. About 50 per cent. of pregnancies are unplanned. Not all unplanned pregnancies will be unwanted, but many will be and we must think carefully about the consequences for individual women and for the whole of society if such women are forced to have those children against their will.

Motherhood is a great responsibility—it is difficult even for those who embrace it willingly. It is worth stating that no woman ever wants to have an abortion. However, many believe that it is the best solution to a dire problem. We have only to look to Northern Ireland to see what happens when legal abortion is severely restricted. Every year, more than 2,000 desperate women travel to England for the procedure. More than 4,000 women travel to England from Eire, where abortion is illegal in all circumstances. Those who cannot afford to travel here sometimes try to abort themselves—that is what happened in Britain before the Abortion Act 1967 allowed safe, legal abortion.

Women have consciences and so do their doctors. Abortion is not a casual choice by women who cannot be bothered to use contraception: it is the last resort of those who are pregnant and who are convinced that it would be better if the potential child were not born. It would be a tragedy for the women if the abortion law were restricted.

The Abortion Act 1967 has served women and their doctors well. Those who oppose abortion in principle like to remind us that there have been almost 4 million legal abortions since the Act became law. They sometimes claim that that is an abhorrence. It is possible to interpret that figure differently and see it as a measure of the benefit that the Act has conferred on women and their existing families: that number of abortions took place because that number was necessary for the well-being of women and their families.

The debate on the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 allowed the opportunity for considerable debate about amendments to the abortion law. The issues were discussed in great detail and some changes were made to the law. The Bill that the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) seeks to put before the House is not motivated by new developments or discoveries that require the Act to be amended. Public opinion is not pressing for a change in the law. The need for abortion on the grounds that it is currently provided in this country remains as pressing today as in 1967.

It is the responsibility of those who sit in the House to draft and pass legislation that affects the everyday lives of the millions of people who live in this country. It is right that we take into account issues that are perceived to be morally difficult or troublesome, but we would be doing the women of this country a great disservice if we allowed access to safe, clinical procedure to be more restricted than it is at present. I ask the House to oppose the Bill.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Amess, Mr. David Alton, Mr. Joe Benton, Sir Graham Bright, Mr. Edward Leigh, Mr. Thomas McAvoy, Mr. John McFall, Mr. Robert Parry, Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock, Rev. Martin Smyth, Dr. Robert Spink and Mrs. Ann Winterton.

ABORTION (AMENDMENT)

Mr. David Amess accordingly presented a Bill to amend section 1(1) of the Abortion Act 1967 in relation to the grounds on which a pregnancy may be terminated: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 24 January 1997, and to be printed [Bill 64].

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not the convention of the House that, if an hon. Member speaks against a ten-minute Bill, he normally votes against it? This is the second time in two weeks that those who oppose us on abortion issues have not had the nerve or the courage to force a Division. The country wants a decision on this matter, but those hon. Members have not had the nerve to force a Division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): It is a convention that hon. Members can oppose but are not obliged to vote.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I sat through the debate on the ten-minute Bill. Am I not right in thinking that the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) asked the House to oppose the excellent Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess)? She made a positive statement to that effect at the end of her speech. It is surely a waste of the House's time to make such a statement and then not carry it through to a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter on which I can rule.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Further to the original point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. For a long time it was a convention of the House—I have heard occupants of the Chair say this—that, if hon. Members opposed a ten-minute Bill, they had to follow their opposition through to a vote. Is that correct?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not correct. [Interruption.] I call the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) to order. In my time in the House and in the Chair, hon. Members on both sides of the House have opposed such Bills, but have not forced a vote.

Orders of the Day

Protection from Harassment Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

5.4 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill has one simple aim: to protect the victims of harassment.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Will hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber please do so quietly?

Mr. Howard: In the past year, a number of highly publicised stalking cases have come to public attention. They have highlighted the need to give the courts more effective powers to deal with stalkers. The Bill covers not only stalkers, but disruptive neighbours and those who target people because of the colour of their skin.

The hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) raised the issue of stalking in the summer, with her private Member's Bill. The hon. Lady deserves to be congratulated on her initiative in raising the matter, and I do so, but there had been no opportunity to consult on her proposals, and her Bill had significant deficiencies.

The hon. Lady's Bill attempted to specify the behaviour that amounted to stalking. The conduct known as stalking can take many forms. Even though the list set out in the hon. Lady's Bill was not intended to be exhaustive, it would have served to focus the attention of the courts on the behaviour represented in it. Other types of behaviour, which might be just as distressing for the victim, might, in effect, have been excluded because of the way in which her Bill was drafted. Those points were made in response to the consultation exercise the Government carried out on our proposals. It is therefore particularly mystifying that Opposition Front Benchers have tabled amendments to this Bill that would reproduce those defects.

Furthermore, the hon. Lady's Bill created strict offences: people would have had to prove their innocence if they had carried out any of the actions described in her Bill. There were no safeguards for journalists or others whose legitimate activities were similar to the actions that amounted to stalking. Those are serious deficiencies when we are dealing with behaviour that, in many instances, is ordinary and does not merit criminalisation. It is necessary to distinguish between instances when such behaviour is acceptable and when it is not.

That was not just the Government's view. As Dr. Evonne von Heussen-Countryman, the director of the national anti-stalking and harassment campaign, said:

"A bad Bill is worse than no Bill . . . and her proposals"—

referring to the hon. Lady's Bill—

"were not precise enough. You have to be able to defend legitimate activities such as debt collecting against the stalking charge".

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Why is the Secretary of State so confident that he has now got the Bill right, given that people outside have had only 10 days to examine it and to comment on it?

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman had waited, he would have discovered that I propose to explain precisely why the Bill remedies those deficiencies. His point about the length of time that the Bill has been available is absurd, given the extent and detail of the consultation on the proposals before they were enshrined in it.

I believe that the proposals in the Bill will be effective, and will provide the protection for victims of harassment that I am sure—I think I am sure—all hon. Members want to achieve.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The Home Secretary said that the Bill covers racially motivated harassment. Where exactly in the Bill does that appear?

Mr. Howard: It is not necessary to refer to racial harassment for the Bill to cover activities that constitute harassment on grounds of race as well as on other grounds.

The Bill overcomes the difficulty of defining stalking by focusing on the harmful effect that this activity has on its victims. At one level, stalkers cause their victims harassment. The Bill therefore creates civil and—in England and Wales—criminal measures to deal with situations where harassment is caused. That approach is not new—action against harassment was taken in the Public Order Act 1986—but the present Bill goes much further. It also creates a new civil tort, and provides both the civil and criminal courts with powers to make orders to protect the victims of harassment from future actions by their tormentors.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): In the light of what he has just said, can the Home Secretary explain why more than 1,000 days have passed since the first proposals were tabled in the form of amendments to the Bill that became the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 during its Committee stage? In fact, I think that some 1,016 days have passed. Why has it taken two and a half years to present these proposals to the House?

Mr. Howard: Because, as has been apparent from previous attempts to deal with it, this is a difficult matter. We were, for example, keen to learn as much as possible from experience of how such matters were dealt with overseas, to see whether we could benefit from such knowledge. We were anxious to get the proposals right.

It is no good one Opposition Member saying that the measures have been rushed through, and another saying minutes later that the process has taken far too long. We have been very careful to get our proposals right and to consult fully on them, and we are now confident that the Bill represents an effective way forward.

Dame Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): As it stands, the Bill refers to harassment or stalking that causes upset and distress. A constituent of mine is being harassed by a group of people. Will the Bill, as it were, tie up the various criminal acts to which I believe that group is subjecting my constituent? Not just one person, but a group of people, is causing considerable harassment to a single woman with a family, and I should like to be reassured that the Bill will help.

Mr. Howard: As my right hon. Friend will appreciate, it is difficult for me to give a categorical answer without knowing the details of the case. I can certainly confirm, however, that the Bill will cover groups of people who perpetrate such offences, as well as individuals. I hope that that gives my right hon. Friend the reassurance that she and her constituent want.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Howard: I will, but then I must make progress.

Mr. Tipping: The Home Secretary said earlier that the Bill would apply to nuisance neighbours, and then described harassment and its definition. The Bill's definition is clear: harassment is described as what a reasonable person would consider to be harassment. Many hon. Members know about nuisance neighbours, and a good many people consult them about the problem. Those people have ceased to be reasonable. I fear that the Bill is too widely drafted, and will not help in such circumstances.

Mr. Howard: I think that the hon. Gentleman is confused. Of course it is true that some people are driven by the activities of others, sometimes neighbours, to a state in which they may not have all the attitudes of a reasonable person; but that is not what the Bill refers to. The Bill lays down that the test of guilt in regard to harassment should be whether an offender is committing actions that a reasonable person in the position of the offender would expect to give rise to harassment.

The greatest difficulty that the police find in using existing legislation against stalkers is the need to prove the intention of the stalker. These provisions dispense with that requirement, so that a person who pursues a course of conduct that he ought to have known would cause harassment will commit an offence. A person ought to know that his course of conduct would amount to harassment in circumstances in which a reasonable person, in possession of the same information, would think that that course of conduct would cause the person at whom it was directed the effects of harassment, such as alarm or distress. The maximum sentence for the criminal offence of harassment will be six months' imprisonment and/or a level 5 fine.

We believe that that test gets the balance right between the need to protect victims from the destructive behaviour of stalkers and the need to prevent the courts from being used for the pursuit of frivolous claims. A victim would have to show that harassment had been caused, and that the stalker ought to have known that that would be the effect of his actions—and stalkers will no longer be able to claim as a defence that they did not intend to harass their victims.

By defining the offence in terms of the effect that the actions have on the victim, the proposals in the Bill will catch activity that causes harassment, irrespective of whether it might be termed stalking or something else. I have in mind, in particular, conduct that causes racial harassment. The Bill will catch that conduct if the conduct occurs on more than one occasion, and in circumstances in which the perpetrator ought to have known that his words or behaviour would cause harassment, alarm or distress. Similarly, those who harass their neighbours through a course of conduct would fall within the ambit of this offence, as harassment may be caused in or from a private house. The Bill therefore builds on the provisions of section 4A of the Public Order Act 1986.

The Bill also provides some specific defences. It will be a defence to show that the conduct was pursued for the prevention and detection of crime, or under an enactment or rule of law. Because of the nature of the activities pursued by stalkers, unless special provision is made, some police activities could be caught by the Bill. That, of course, is not our intention. I am also aware that the activities of journalists, salesmen, religious activists, debt collectors, private investigators and even political canvassers might fall within the scope of the Bill. We have therefore provided a defence of acting reasonably in the particular circumstances of the case in order to safeguard these legitimate activities.

We have not defined harassment itself. Harassment as a concept has been interpreted regularly by the courts since 1986. Some 100 cases were dealt with by the courts in 1995 under section 4A of the 1986 Act, 40 leading to a conviction. However, to avoid doubt, the Bill makes it clear that harassment includes causing someone alarm or distress, and that a course of conduct includes speech.

As well as the summary offence of causing harassment, the Bill creates a second, more serious, criminal offence in England and Wales—that of causing someone to fear violence. Where the level of harassment caused places someone in fear of violence being used against them, more severe penalties are required to reflect the gravity of the conduct. The maximum penalty for that offence will be five years' imprisonment and/or an unlimited fine.

As I have said, the Bill creates civil and criminal measures in England and Wales. Criminal proceedings can deal only with offences that have already been committed; the criminal law cannot provide protection for someone who might reasonably expect that he or she might be subject to harassment in the future. Nor does it provide adequate protection where the evidence does not satisfy the criminal standard of proof. A conviction in criminal proceedings requires the jury or magistrates to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the defendant committed the offence. In civil proceedings, the court needs to be satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the defendant harassed the victim.

Civil proceedings also enable victims to be compensated for the distress and disturbance to their lives that harassment causes, just as they are when any other tort is committed. Civil proceedings would be taken by a victim, or a potential victim, where the need is to prevent the stalker from pursuing, or beginning a course of conduct. Action in the civil courts would be appropriate, for example, if just one act of harassment had taken place but there was fear that further acts would be committed, which would constitute a course of conduct. The civil courts could—if persuaded on the balance of probabilities that it was necessary to do so—grant an injunction, preventing the stalker from carrying out any specified activity which would amount to harassment. Breach of an order made under the tort created in the Bill would, if proved beyond reasonable doubt, be a criminal offence punishable by up to five years' imprisonment and/or an unlimited fine.

When dealing with criminal offences that cause harassment, or cause someone to fear violence, we need not only to punish offenders for their actions but to reassure the victim that it will not happen again. As I have just said, the civil law provides a remedy in such circumstances.

We have, however, listened carefully to people who have argued that it cannot be right in circumstances such as these to require a victim to go through a second hearing in a civil court, following a conviction in a criminal court, to gain an order preventing future harassment. We therefore think it right that criminal courts should have the power, when sentencing a person for an offence committed under the Bill, to make an order restraining a person from pursuing further conduct against the victim—or any other person named in the order—which amounts to harassment, or will cause fear of violence.

A breach of an order made under the Bill, if proved to the criminal standard—beyond reasonable doubt—will itself be a criminal offence. The offence will carry a maximum penalty of five years in prison and/or an unlimited fine. That will enable breaches to be dealt with quickly, with the involvement of the police. Where the risk to the victim is sufficiently serious, the offender can be held in custody. The breach of a civil order under the Bill may be dealt with as contempt of court rather than as a criminal matter.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): The right hon. and learned Gentleman is talking about offences committed under the Bill and the fact that a person who breaches it may then be subject to another criminal offence. What if a person is convicted under another statute, but harassment takes place afterwards? Would it be possible for the judge to inform the convicted person that, if he indulged in harassment, he would automatically be subject to another criminal offence?

Mr. Howard: I am not sure that it would be open to the judge to say anything precisely along those lines. It would of course be open to the judge, as it is at the moment, to draw the attention of someone who has been convicted and who is before him of the perils that he will face if he continues with a particular course of conduct. As I have sought to explain, there will be particular new and additional remedies available to the victim in such circumstances, but I am not sure that the precise warning that the hon. Gentleman has in mind would be the sort of language that would be likely to emanate from the judicial bench.

I have set out the aims of the Bill as it applies to England and Wales. In Scotland, the aims are identical. The existing common law in Scotland already adequately covers acts that cause harassment, so no new criminal offences are proposed. A new delict—the Scottish equivalent of a tort—is, however, provided for in the Bill.

The Government have tabled an amendment that would allow the Bill's provisions to be extended to Northern Ireland by negative resolution. It is important that the people of Northern Ireland are offered the same protection from harassment as people in the rest of the United Kingdom.

I have set out the principles that lie behind the Bill and why we believe that it will offer an effective remedy against harassment. It may help the House if I briefly explain the Bill's structure.

Clause 1 describes the course of conduct that amounts to harassment in England and Wales and sets out the defences available. Clause 2 makes it a criminal offence for a person to pursue a course of conduct in breach of clause 1. Clause 3 creates a civil tort in relation to the course of conduct described in clause 1. Clause 4 creates the more serious offence of pursuing a course of conduct that puts someone in fear of violence. Clause 5 gives criminal courts the power, when sentencing a person for an offence under clause 2 or 4, to make a restraining order.

Clause 6 provides that actions for damages under clause 3 are subject to a six-year limitation period rather than the three-year period applicable to personal injury cases. Clause 7 defines certain terms used in the earlier clauses, notably that a course of conduct is conduct that occurs on at least two occasions, and includes speech.

Clauses 8 to 11 apply to Scotland. Clause 8 creates a delict. Clause 9 provides that breach of an order made under clause 8 is a criminal offence, similar to the provisions for England and Wales. Clause 10 allows for the award of damages. Clause 11 creates the concept of a restraining order in the Scottish criminal courts.

To ensure that the work of the intelligence and security services is not compromised, clause 12 provides that the Secretary of State for the Home Department may certify, retrospectively, that a course of conduct carried out by a specified person on a specified occasion related to national security, the economic well-being of the United Kingdom, or the prevention or detection of serious crimes, and was done on behalf of the Crown.

The Bill does not bind the Crown or, therefore, agents of the Crown, so the intelligence and security services—and other investigative agencies such as customs and benefit fraud investigators pursuing their responsibilities—are exempt from its provisions. The certification procedure is intended to ensure that that exemption can be proved in the situations described, quickly and effectively.

The remaining clauses deal with the extent, commencement and short title of the Bill.

Those, then, are the Government's proposals to deal with stalking. As I have said, their effects will go beyond what might be termed classic stalking to provide protection for others who are persecuted by anti-social behaviour. The proposals are part of the Government's aim to make the streets and communities of Britain safer.

I am sorry that, despite all the fine words of the Opposition on this subject, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has tabled amendments that would significantly weaken the Bill and reduce the protection that it would afford the public, but perhaps he will in due course be able to dispel that impression, which is certainly the impression that we have formed of the amendments that have been tabled. As always, we look forward to hearing from him and from his colleagues.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Like the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for whom Christmas has come about a week early, I begin with a tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson), who will be winding up for the Opposition on Second Reading. Concern about stalking, the absence of any criminal remedies and the inadequacy of civil remedies has been widely held for many years. There was a debate about that in 1994 during proceedings on the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill, but it took the unusual determination and tenacity of my hon. Friend to translate that concern into a coherent Bill against stalking, which she introduced on 6 March.

For reasons that I shall come to, Ministers decided to block my hon. Friend's Bill when it was due for its Second Reading on 10 May. Prompted, I believe, by public anger at their refusal to back that Bill, on 9 July, Ministers published a consultative paper, "Stalking—The Solutions" and finally this Bill on 5 December. When it passes through the other place and becomes law early next year, my hon. Friend can feel proud of her achievement in ensuring that, at long last, people who are subject to the pain and trauma of stalking have better protection from the law than they ever did before.

We support the Bill, although we want it to be improved in Committee, and we have agreed with the Government to secure all its stages in the House today and tomorrow. Given that agreement, I was astonished—although perhaps I should never be surprised by words from the Secretary of State or his political adviser—by an accusation today in The Times and the Daily Mail that Labour was, in the Secretary of State's words, "reneging" on a promise to back the Government's anti-stalking Bill.

The Secretary of State must know that that allegation is completely untrue. He knows, because he was involved in the discussions, that the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department said that the allegation was "nasty", not an adjective that I would use. Where both sides have agreed that there will be a certain amount of time taken to get through an agreed measure, it is unacceptable for one side then to complain when the other side seeks to ensure that those undertakings are carried through. Nothing that we have done in tabling amendments to the Bill in any sense undermines the spirit and letter of our agreement to ensure that the Bill secures all its stages in the House today and in the half day tomorrow.

I understand from my hon. Friends that there have even been complaints that we have tabled amendments at all. That comes rich from a Government who have tabled five amendments to the Bill.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): To their own Bill.

Mr. Straw: Indeed.

The Secretary of State's complaint about the Bill of hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen was that it was too simplistic a solution I paraphrase to a very complicated matter. Of course we accept his injunction that it is better to have no Bill at all than a bad Bill. Given all the bad Bills that Labour Members have had to deal with week after week, I only wish that he had followed that injunction.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen introduced her Bill in March, she gave some chilling case studies of women who had been stalked. In some cases, some sort of legal sanction had finally been imposed on the stalker. In most cases, however, the stalkers had managed to evade or avoid any sanction. My hon. Friend said:

"Those who describe stalking as merely a nuisance should try speaking to a victim."

She quoted with approval the view of the Police Federation that "it is frightening enough knowing that your every move is being watched, that you are being followed. But what if you are being trailed day after day, bombarded with unwanted letters, flowers and gifts, plagued with telephone calls and even go to collect your child from school to find a stranger has beaten you to it. It can ruin your life and"— said the Police Federation—

"that is what is happening now to ordinary people, mainly women."—[Official Report, 6 March 1996; Vol. 273, c. 370.]

Given that stalking can and has ruined the lives of many ordinary people for many years, the first question before the House is why existing law has proved so inadequate to counter the crime. One reason, I suggest, is that criminal law in England and Wales has developed to deal mainly with acute incidents of criminal behaviour—a murder, a robbery, a theft and so on—but it is far less developed in dealing adequately with behaviour such as stalking or serious neighbourhood disruption, which is continuous and where the whole is infinitely worse than the sum of the parts or any individual part.

Individual acts of stalking such as those mentioned by the Police Federation—the odd letter of affection or the occasional bouquet of flowers—may be no more than eccentric, and should not bring down the force of the criminal or civil law. What causes the intense distress and so marks out stalking is the persistence and continuity of the conduct.

A similar situation exists in relation to anti-social behaviour by neighbours. In a densely populated island like Britain, we must all accept that life in cities and towns will not always be peace and quiet. Most of us are willing to tolerate the occasional noisy disruption from neighbours; but when disruption becomes continuous and when those causing it ignore reasonable requests to desist and intimidate those who dare to complain, the effect, like that of stalking, shifts from being an occasional nuisance to a continuous nightmare

In the past, such continuous, chronic criminal behaviour has generally been dealt with informally through community pressure, or perhaps by the informal intervention of the police, rather than through the formal involvement of the criminal law.

When the criminal justice system has tried to deal with stalking or neighbour harassment, on the whole it has failed. That its because it has tended to chop up the continuous film of persistent misbehaviour into individual, discrete snapshots. Furthermore, as the Secretary of State mentioned, it has been required to prove intent. In other words, the criminal justice system has sought to turn a chronic condition into a series of acute ones.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen sought to fill the gap in respect of stalking with the Bill that she introduced in March. Her Bill prohibited individuals from a "course of conduct" likely to cause a person to feel harassed, alarmed or distressed so as to fear for his or her safety, or that of a linked third person, such as a child. In our view, my hon. Friend's Bill got to the heart of the mischief of stalking. With just a modicum of good will from Ministers, drafting amendments could have been made to her Bill and it could have been on the statute book last summer. The necessary protection for victims of stalking could already have been law.

That was not the first time that the Government had blocked action against stalking. In 1994 and again in 1995, Ministers dead-batted calls for stalking to be tackled, using as their reason the fact that they were conducting a study of anti-stalking laws and definitions in other countries. That was the essence of the answers given to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) on 17 July 1995 and to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) on 6 February this year.

That study into other countries seems to have led Ministers to a negative conclusion. Other countries with anti-stalking measures, such as Canada, New Zealand and Australia, have each, I understand, used fairly specific definitions. The Bill, however, provides a much looser, more general definition of harassment, with the intention that over time the courts will gradually fill in the gaps by helping to define the test of reasonable knowledge in clause 1(2) and the defence of reasonableness in subsection (3), and to develop the tort of harassment provided in clause 3.

I understand the Government's intentions. Having myself, like the Secretary of State, been brought up in the English legal tradition, I have enormous respect for the intellectual ingenuity of the common law and for our courts' capacity to grow great oaks of jurisprudence from the smallest shoots. But a balance must be struck, especially in the criminal law, between an offence general enough to deal effectively with the mischief complained of, and an offence so vague that in practice courts will not convict.

For that reason, we favour a belt-and-braces approach in the Bill, unless we are persuaded to the contrary by the wisdom of the Minister of State, Home Office, the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). We do not seek to disturb the general definition in clause 1. However, without prejudice to the generality of that definition, which is important to our amendment, we believe that the Bill should give some detail of the circumstances in which stalking may arise. That is the purpose of our amendment, which can be considered in more detail in Committee on the Floor of the House later today.

In May this year the Secretary of State wrote to me to explain why the Government would not support the Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen. The Minister of State wrote to my hon. Friend in the same terms. The objection then, which I ask my hon. Friends to note carefully, was that the scope of my hon. Friend's Bill was too wide. Today we hear that the objection to my hon. Friend's Bill was that the scope of her Bill was too narrow. I am confused, as is the Secretary of State, I think.

The Secretary of State went on the record in The Times today with the churlish and nonsensical allegation that we would seek to block progress on what amounts to my hon. Friend's Bill. He said that our proposals > "would significantly reduce the public's protection from harassment."

The Secretary of State owes it to the House to tell us, when he winds up the debate, which of his objections to my hon. Friend's Bill is correct. Was it his objection in May, when he said that her Bill was too wide, or is it his objection today, when he says that it was too narrow? The two statements cannot both be correct.

Ministers claimed in the Daily Mail today that the Suzy Lamplugh Trust opposed the provisions that we put forward in one of the amendments.

Mr. Howard: I should not want to put the hon. Gentleman to the inconvenience of waiting for the explanation that he seeks, so I am happy to give it to him now. Both criticisms are valid. The hon. Lady's Bill was too narrow for the reason that I advanced in my remarks earlier this afternoon: because the Bill provided a list, there was a danger that stalking would be interpreted exclusively by reference to that list. As I also explained, the hon. Lady's Bill was too wide because it covered activities of people such as journalists and political canvassers, who were not provided with the defence of acting reasonably in all the circumstances, which the Government's proposals provide. Those criticisms are valid, and I hope that that provides the hon. Gentleman with the explanation that he sought.

Mr. Straw: Once before, I advised the Secretary of State that, when he is in a hole, he should stop digging. I repeat that advice. I have the letter sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen by the Minister of State, Home Office. It does not mention the concern expressed by the Home Office back in May that the Bill was too narrow. The letter merely alleges that the Bill was too wide. That could have been dealt with satisfactorily if Ministers had tabled amendments to the Bill to provide more adequate defences.

On the Secretary of State's second point—he made it today through his mouthpiece, the Daily Mail—our amendment, which incorporates the particulars contained in the Bill sponsored by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen, does not affect the generality of the Secretary of State's proposals. That fact is stated in our amendment.

I am sorry to disappoint the Secretary of State with the news that he and the Daily Mail were misinformed about the views of the Suzy Lamplugh Trust. Yesterday, the trust seemed to criticise Labour by stating:

> "Mr. Blair had got it wrong."

I have a message from the Suzy Lamplugh trust, to my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen, which states:

> "I would like to apologise for problems caused as a result of the statement in the Daily Mail today from The Suzy Lamplugh Trust . . . At the time of speaking to the Daily Mail yesterday, I misunderstood the intention of the amendments within the Bill".

I am not surprised that the person who wrote that misunderstood the amendments, as the amendments' details were explained to her by someone on the Daily Mail, which is not known as one of the primary organs of truth in our society.

Mr. Howard: Have you cleared that with Blair?

Mr. Straw: The one certainty—perhaps the only certainty—about the press at the next general election is that the Daily Mail will not support the Labour party. Support from The Daily Telegraph is questionable, and it is certainly questionable from The Sun, The Times and the Daily Star. But I think that we can say with some certainty that the Daily Mail will support the Conservative party. Indeed, I would be profoundly shocked if that certainty in my life was not the case—[Interruption.] This is rebuttal.

The message from the Suzy Lamplugh Trust continues:

"The Trust is very pleased that Labour are still working to improve the Bill", and states that it supports the amendments tabled by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen.

All the amendments tabled by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen aim to strengthen and improve the Bill. We want civil and criminal courts to be given powers to order offenders to undertake counselling, to make them confront their offending behaviour. That provision would be piloted before being introduced on a nationwide basis. We also believe that, in certain circumstances, better protection is necessary for stalking victims who are used as witnesses, and that civil courts' duties in relation to injunctions should be made clear in the Bill.

As a common lawyer, I confess no detailed knowledge of Scots law—I profess virtually no knowledge, as it is drawn from a very different legal tradition. However, my hon. Friends representing seats north of the border have told me that reliance in Scotland on its—albeit different—breach of the peace provisions to control stalking is not satisfactory. That is why my hon. Friends desire the inclusion into Scots law of a separate, parallel statutory offence. I should make it clear that, with regret, we do not support the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), because they would require proof of intent and subjective knowledge. As I have told him, we shall vote against his amendments if they are pushed to a Division.

When the Bill was published, and again today, the Secretary of State claimed that it would also help to deal with the mounting problem of criminal anti-social behaviour by neighbours. Those of us who for years have been calling—although on deaf ears—for Government action against the growing problem of neighbourhood harassment should have uttered hallelujahs at the Government's change of tack, and reminded ourselves of the need to be charitable to sinners, such as the Secretary of State, who have repented. I should also mention the extent to which the Government have for so long denied that the issue presents any problem that makes any amendment to the law worthy, and the fact that, given the scale of the problems, the remedy offered by the Bill is entirely inadequate.

In June 1995, after months of consultation with local authorities and others, on behalf of the Labour party I published a document entitled "A Quiet Life", which outlined detailed proposals to deal with problem of criminal anti-social neighbours. That document contained some alarming case histories and discussed the serious defects in current law. We proposed a new form of injunction to deal with the problem—a community safety order—which could be obtained by the police or by the local council, acting on behalf of victims. Thus, we proposed to mix the best of civil and of criminal law. It would be a civil remedy, in the form of an injunction, which would be enforced by the criminal law if it were breached.

The Government's reaction to our proposals at that stage was revealing. It revealed their profound complacency and the "not invented here" attitude which has cost them so dear in public support. Instead of the slightest acknowledgement that there was a problem that required a solution, there was contemptuous dismissal. When the draft proposals were published, in June 1995, the Prime Minister sought to dismiss them as "merely window dressing".—[Official Report, 22 June 1995; Vol. 262, c. 472.]

In September 1996, the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration described our proposals as "unnecessary", claiming that "measures already exist to deal with problems".

I do not know of a single victim of serious harassment by bad neighbours in my constituency or in any constituency who believes that current law is adequate to deal with his or her problem. Those dismissals of our proposals were a grave error by Ministers, because they simply revealed one fact: Ministers planned to do nothing to deal with the problem. They planned to do nothing to help people whose lives were being ruined by anti-social behaviour, and nothing to assist local authorities which were struggling to use the wholly inadequate remedies in current law.

As on the issues of knives, paedophiles and stalking, Ministers eventually woke up to the fact that the Opposition had identified a serious problem that required action. As is often the case, however, their remedies are too little, too late. Considered in conjunction with the provisions of the Housing Act 1996, their proposals fail in many key respects to measure up to the scale of the problem of criminal anti-social behaviour by bad neighbours.

The powers in the 1996 Act apply only to tenants and not to all tenants in an area, whereas evidence shows that, in many areas, the anti-social behaviour of residents in owner-occupied housing can be just as damaging as the behaviour of those who are council, housing association or private tenants. The defective power to intervene given to local authorities under section 222 of the Local Government Act 1972—which has been highlighted by the problems that Coventry has had in the Finnie case—remains unamended.

Even more importantly, civil remedies provided by this Bill are available only at the suit of the individual victim—which I think was the gravamen of the intervention by the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) on the speech of the Secretary of State. The Bill's provisions do not take proper account of the huge pressures that victims experience, and therefore of the need for police and councils to act together to secure community safety for the residents of a specific area. That is why our proposals do not place the duty on individual victims, who are often so intimidated that they are frightened—like many of my hon. Friends, I have witnessed the fear of constituents—that they will not make a complaint, and are even less willing to become the principal prosecution witness in a criminal prosecution.

The Bill does not contain even the weaker provision—which the parallel provision in section 60 of the Family Law Act 1996 does—for court rules enabling third parties to bring proceedings. I should tell the House that, had there been time—we accept that there is not—for the matter to be properly and fully examined in Standing Committee, we certainly would have moved detailed amendments to remedy the serious defects that we have found in that section of the Bill.

In August 1996, the right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) said that the Government had "lost the plot" on law and order. The Government's indecision and uncertainty on stalking is just one illustration of why his damning conclusion about his Front-Bench colleagues was correct. First, they prevaricated for two years; then they blocked the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen without adequate justification; then, as was no doubt his intention when he blocked the Bill in May, the Home Secretary went to his party conference not to thank my hon. Friend for bringing the matter into the public domain, but to proclaim the Bill on stalking as his invention. He said:

"We need quick and effective remedies for the less serious cases, and tough sanctions for the most serious."

He went on:

"I can announce that we shall have them. Women deserve that protection; they need that protection; and I will make sure they get it."

The implication was that the Government would sponsor the Bill. Unfortunately, the legislative programme announced in the Loyal Address did not bear the promise out. Instead, two days before the Queen's Speech, we were told—again by a newspaper, not by the Home Secretary—that the Bill would be left to the lottery of the private Member's Bill procedure. I then made the Home Secretary a clear and specific offer of co-operation on getting a Government Bill through the House. That offer was rejected.

On the day of the Queen's Speech—I am glad to see that the Home Secretary is smiling about this—Ministers spent all day until 3.30 pm in radio and television studios, defending the decision to turn what would have been a Government Bill into a private Member's Bill. As we all remember, during his speech on the Loyal Address, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgemoor—[HON. MEMBERS: "Sedgefield."] My right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) repeated the offer that I had made only two days before—an offer that had been rejected.

We then witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of an impromptu meeting of the Cabinet's legislation Committee on the Treasury Bench.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): Decisive leadership.

Mr. Straw: "Decisive leadership," says one of the devils on the Treasury Bench. The Prime Minister suddenly decided to overrule his Home Secretary again and make the Bill a Government Bill. By the end of the Prime Minister's speech on the Loyal Address, the Home Secretary's demeanour gave every indication that he had been subject to persistent and wanton harassment by his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and wished for legal protection from it.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition told the House on 23 October that we would co-operate to get the measure on the statute book quickly. We are doing that. The worst is that, if the Government had shown the House the same co-operation then as we are showing now, a comprehensive Bill against stalking could have been law six months ago. Who knows how many people could have been protected during that interval if the Government had done then what we are doing now?

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I offer ungrudging support for the Bill, following what we have heard from the Opposition. I was under the impression that we were uniting in an effort to put on the statute book a measure that is required by the people of this country. The Government have responded to public opinion, and it would have improved the reputation of the House if all hon. Members had given the Bill the whole-hearted support that it deserves.

I have some short points to make about the Bill. It is really two measures in one. First, it is a response to a number of highly publicised and serious offences of what has come to be called stalking. Secondly, our fellow citizens have a far wider need for protection from activities that are not necessarily of that type, but are straightforward harassment, when individuals or groups pick on others because of some perceived weakness, putting them in fear. We must stress the fact that the Bill will give an opportunity to deal with many incidents of harassment, as well as its primary aim of dealing with the dreadful cases of women being stalked.

Men also require protection from harassment. On some occasions, men in the public eye, perhaps in the world of entertainment, need protection from neurotic women, who can be just as much of a nuisance to them and just as disruptive of their lives as some men can be to women.

Some decades ago, the House took away the protection provided for those faced with harassment during industrial disputes when it abandoned the old concept of a criminal offence of watching and besetting. I recall that being taken from the statute book. I felt at the time that the offence should not have been removed. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has said, when people are watched, they are afraid, their lives are disrupted and they are unable to function normally in their ordinary family lives. I am pleased that the Bill will restore that concept. I trust that it will be used in the old-fashioned context. Those who do not want to take part in industrial disputes are as entitled to protection from harassment as are those who are the object of sexual admiration from unwanted sources.

We may well find that the Bill will be particularly significant for younger persons. Violence among young people seems to be increasing. Those in vulnerable minorities are subject to continual, progressive harassment. One minority group—those who are seen as ethnically different from the majority group in the area—has already been mentioned, but those whose other activities may be regarded as different are also affected. Such people may simply attend the wrong school, or join the boy scouts, or they may simply be young people who behave themselves and do not wish to join gangs and other groups. I trust that the Bill will make it possible to deal with those above the age of criminal responsibility who are not yet adults. The Bill refers to "persons". That includes teenagers, who have just as much right to go about their business as do those over the age of 18.

[Mr. Peter Griffiths]

While I support the Bill entirely, I have one other point to raise that may create a problem when the measure is enacted; many of those who carry out harassment are mentally disturbed. I have some doubts as to whether those who carry out repeated acts of harassment will be prevented from continuing by the taking out of a court order to desist. They will end up in prison. We already know that the key reason for many people being convicted and sent to prison is mental instability. Very little provision is made for them in prison to ensure that, when they leave the institution, they have been cured of the problem that took them there.

I was interested to hear the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) talk about the need for counselling. We must go beyond that. We need an educative process for those subject to an injunction and, perhaps, for those in prison. The matter will not be solved simply by issuing an order and sending the offender to gaol for a period.

The Bill deserves the House's whole-hearted support. I trust that we shall achieve unanimity in Committee and that it will quickly reach the statute book to provide protection for our constituents who suffer from harassment.

5.59 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): The hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) gave his ungrudging support to the Bill, but half his speech was mild criticism. I give my ungrudging support and do not feel guilty about offering some suggestions. There is remarkable unanimity and homogeneity in a parliamentary assembly that is not noted for taking such an approach. Opposition Members do not have to sacrifice their critical faculties to avoid being accused of not favouring the Bill.

I very much welcome the Bill and the Home Secretary's introductory remarks, which explained not only that it will apply to stalked women and men but that it has a racial dimension and that it can be used to deal with obstreperous neighbours. All hon. Members know from their surgeries of people who have been stalked, if that is the right word, by next-door neighbours who apply exceptional pressure to them. I also welcome the Home Secretary's remarks about the application of the legislation to group harassment; cases need not involve only one person doing the harassing.

I am delighted that, at long last, this measure is about to reach the statute book. It does not imply hostility to say that we must be careful because experience shows that we are not always brilliant legislators. For various reasons, political and otherwise, there is an element of haste in what we are doing. I hope that the Minister and my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) will say that, if parts of the legislation prove to be inappropriate, there will be opportunities to revisit the matter. If we pass legislation swiftly, it is incumbent on us to remedy, where feasible, any glaring weaknesses that, in legislating speedily, we have overlooked. I suspect that Members of the other place will earn their per diem allowances by using their expertise in scrutinising the Bill to supplement our expertise.

Stalking has increased in recent years. A growing number of women, and some men, are subject to varying degrees of harassment from individuals who pursue them. That involves not only television and film celebrities but ordinary members of the public. The excellent briefing produced by the Library describes the remedies, but it is obvious from recent well-publicised cases that both the criminal and civil law are inadequate. People rightly expect us to legislate to protect victims of what is, regrettably, a growing menace.

Last year, I attended a conference in the United States that had a session devoted to stalking. It was organised by the American Society for Industrial Security, the largest professional association of people involved in investigation and security. As one would expect, much research is being done in the United States. It is important not only that we should consider legislation in other countries but that we consider research elsewhere into the phenomenon of stalking.

Among the papers presented at the conference were useful documents on what is being done in the United States, especially in the Los Angeles police department. The LAPD has not been above criticism of late, but it seems to be a leader in this field. It set up a threat management unit 1990 to investigate in the long term the normal patterns of threat. It has offered considerable advice to officers on how to deal with stalking.

The research suggests that, unless one appreciates the different sorts of stalking, one will not necessarily use the right methods to tackle it: it goes into detail about erotomanic, love obsessional, and simple obsessional cases. It is important for the police to know how to deal with harassment, not simply from the perspective of dealing with the perpetrator but from that of dealing sensitively with people who are being harassed, or who allege that they are being harassed. Such people require much information and support to help them to deal with what can be a horrifying experience.

Several strategies have been devised for police and victims to pursue, to try to prevent stalkers from continuing to stalk. With measures such as this, there is a danger that there will be a spate of complaints, many of which will be valid and require the assistance of psychiatrists, the police and the courts. However, there will be some cases where people do not understand the legislation, refuse to understand it, or try to take advantage of it. They could place enormous pressure on the police and the courts to deal with cases that should never have got near the courts, which could become clogged up. There is potential for people to use the new legislation wrongly. That is why it is important that the police should know how to deal with different sorts and levels of complaints or incidents.

The LAPD's idea is to educate victims about stalking and its wider dimension so that they can be apprised realistically of what the police and the authorities can do. It is right to advise victims of stalking about means of modifying their behaviour and patterns of movement, if necessary, to minimise risk, such as changing telephone numbers or moving, although the latter is a sign of failure. Therapeutic strategies can be devised to help victims deal better with the phenomenon.

It is also important—some people may think that it is not the purpose of legislation, but I believe that it should be—to consider how the police should deal with alleged perpetrators. There are a variety of ways. Often in the United States, private investigators are involved. Much more must be done than confronting stalkers with a knee in the groin and the threat of further physical retribution. Los Angeles police say that they can write to or telephone alleged stalkers and apply for temporary restraining orders preventing them from making contact with victims. They can use arrest and detention or what they call mental health diversion. Finally, they can seek criminal conviction. Their approach has reduced the number of allegations of stalking to more manageable proportions, to advantage.

I suspect, and fervently hope, that the Home Secretary and the Minister will be able to tell us about research being conducted by the police and by the excellent research department in the Home Office, and about funding for academic research into the phenomenon of stalking. Unless we can comprehend the phenomenon, legislation will miss the mark and we will not achieve our objectives. It can be dramatically demonstrated that an aggressive intervention posture by the police can be effective, and I hope that the police are pursuing the matter.

I am not declaring an interest, but the Minister and I have long had an interest in the regulation of the private security industry—that has been a totally abortive venture for the past 17 years, but there is still hope—and one element that requires regulation is the profession of private investigators. The profession is used by a wide variety of individuals and organisations and, at the respectable end, is pursued by many people, mostly ex-CID, with diligence and competence.

Private investigation may not be the nicest profession but, like politics, it is necessary. At the bad end there are crooks, or men who have become crooked, deploying tactics that are clearly reprehensible and illegal. I have had discussions with the representative organisations and I have had a partial assurance from the Home Secretary. Although there are certain defences open to investigators, if they fail in the task of surveillance and are spotted, either they are poor investigators or the subject has been clever or lucky enough to spot them.

I seek assurances from the Minister, either in his speech or in response to amendments, that the legislation will not be applied to those at the legitimate end of the private investigation profession. There are, quite rightly, protections for the intelligence services and the police and for reputable investigators who might be employed by a myriad Government Departments.

In some cases there will be levels of harassment far in excess of the instructions given to investigators. Those who are the subject of scrutiny may not endorse what I say. I am sure that there will be a tiny minority of cases of over-vigilant investigators and I hope that the protection will not provide a defence for someone who is clearly guilty.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): The hon. Gentleman is in slight danger of misleading himself, and I think that I can help him. The Secretary of State's certificate is available to agents of the Crown; it would not be available to cover private investigators. In addition, there is a defence for people acting in the course of a legitimate trade or profession, provided that they act reasonably; if they act, as the hon. Gentleman said, far in excess of what is necessary, they will be caught by the Bill.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the principle of clandestine surveillance is that it should not be detected by the subject? There is a requirement in the Bill that there have to have been at least two prior incidents. He and I share a concern with the private security industry, but does he accept that it would be an extremely inept investigator who became subject to the Bill or that, alternatively, there would have to have been a deliberate use of obvious surveillance as a form of harassment?

Mr. George: I am grateful for both those interventions. The Minister reminded me of something of which I was already aware. I am sorry if he gained the impression that I was not. I know full well that the certificate is available to employees of the Crown.

Not all the work of investigators involves wearing a dirty mac and using binoculars, videos or cameras; they pursue many open activities that do not rely on furtive or clandestine behaviour. I recently read an article dividing the investigation profession into 28 different sectors.

I know of several cases, also, in which filming has been done with the acquiescence of the person under surveillance. There was a case involving Manchester council two or three years ago, when it hired an investigator to follow a guy who had put in a claim for £100,000 compensation for an injury: the investigator went on a holiday tour with him and filmed him on a daily basis. One could say that that was not clandestine.

The Bill contains some imprecise references to reasonableness or the pursuit of crime, but perhaps a little more clarity would give greater reassurance to those who are pursuing investigations in a legitimate fashion. It is obvious that some activities of investigators are legal and that occasionally some investigators behave in a way that is absolutely illegal, but the problem is that there is a grey area in the middle that may not be accounted for in the Bill.

A great deal of investigators' work relates to non-criminal activities. A political party, for example, could employ investigators to check on the validity of prospective parliamentary candidates before endorsement. The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department is looking at me with incredulity. Perhaps we could have a chat afterwards, because I think that he has not quite got it right.

Investigators can pursue a variety of activities that are not related to criminal behaviour: the eviction of anti-social neighbours, for example. Local authorities are increasingly looking to private investigators to become professional witnesses and gather evidence to secure an eviction. To do that would require the investigator to keep the neighbours under surveillance, take their photograph and film and follow them. The ultimate aim is not a criminal prosecution but an eviction. If neighbours who were being investigated discovered the fact, they might be able to rush to the courts to seek protection.

I have mentioned the vetting of potential and existing staff. Other investigations that do not lead to criminal prosecutions can involve matrimonial matters, intellectual property, missing persons, debt recovery and many other issues. Sometimes, investigations are part of civil proceedings, but they often do not even lead to that. I therefore ask the Minister at some stage to comment with greater clarity on why he thinks that the Bill as it stands would adequately protect a professionally qualified person in going about his or her professional duties.

[Mr. George]

The Bill is overdue. I am glad that there is not much acrimony over it, apart from some ritualistic criticisms. It is clearly very important that the Bill is passed and that what we pass achieves our objectives. I only hope that, if deficiencies are discovered after Royal Assent, the Government and the Opposition—whoever they may be—will have the good grace to recognise that mistakes have been made and try to remedy them.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): If any justification were needed for the argument that we should think before we leap into making legislation, the Bill supplies it. The Stalking Bill, presented by the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson), which undoubtedly helped to concentrate the Government's minds on the need for a law against stalking—she should be commended for her efforts—was certainly an important step in the right direction. I was happy to encourage her in introducing that Bill, which she has acknowledged and will probably do so again—although whether she does so to embarrass me or not, I do not yet know.

The hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen would not and certainly should not pretend that her Bill is better than the Protection from Harassment Bill. Although, as has already been said, the words of the director of the National Anti-Stalking and Harassment Campaign, Dr. von Heussen-Countryman, to the effect that a bad Bill is worse than no Bill, might have been a somewhat harsh criticism of the Stalking Bill, there can be no doubt that, taking the two Bills side by side, the Bill before us today is an improvement.

I do not think that it was reasonable—it may of course have just been party political posturing—for the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) to complain about the Government's Bill in the terms that he did. It is even less reasonable for him to complain and then support the Bill in the Lobby, as I understand he is going to do. One example of the total unreasonableness, indeed, absurdity, of his comments was to say that the Government were confused in their criticism of the Stalking Bill in saying one moment that it was too wide and in another that it was too narrow. If one has a bird brain, one might think that there is some merit in such a comment, yet it is total nonsense.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary made clear when he helpfully came to the Dispatch Box to stop any more nonsense being perpetrated, when he said that the Stalking Bill was too wide, it was because it would have caught people such as journalists, and when he later said that it was too narrow, he was commenting in a completely different sense. It became obvious as the Bill formulated in the Government's minds that it could be used for wider purposes than dealing just with stalkers. I cannot honestly believe that the hon. Member for Blackburn is so obtuse that he did not realise the distinction. He was just doing what he is now getting used to as we approach the general election: causing mischief.

The letter that my right hon. Friend the Minister wrote in May, to which the hon. Member for Blackburn referred, was obviously written before the Government issued their consultation paper, received their many responses, thought further about the matter and realised that the Bill could be broadened. What on earth is wrong with that? It is time that the Opposition stopped grubbing around to draw distinctions between Labour and Conservative. Either they support our policy, which would be novel, or they oppose it. They must make up their minds and stop standing on their heads and pretending that there is some great distinction between themselves and the Government if they are to help us to introduce sensible legislation.

The Bill is better than the Stalking Bill for a number of obvious reasons. It covers a wider number of offences: not only stalking, but bad neighbours and racial harassment. It is better because it is more precise about the offences, separating harassment from violence and the consequences of the two, which are widely different. It is better because it is more precise about the defences—which is very important—including legitimate surveillance, which the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) mentioned. The Bill is better and will therefore lead to less confusion in the courts.

There is no doubt that the obnoxious activity of stalking needed to be dealt with. More and more terrifying instances were coming to light and being publicised in the newspapers, and it was becoming more and more obvious that the existing law was thoroughly inadequate to deal with them. People have been followed for months and months by harassers, and instances of endless telephone calls at all times of the day and night, causing immense misery, have arisen. Misery was being caused by stalkers with whom the women involved had never had a relationship. The misery of parents worried about paedophiles stalking school playgrounds, and the courts being seemingly incapable of dealing with it, was beginning to emerge, too.

The Government did not just produce a Bill; they considered the Stalking Bill and earlier debates on stalking, they thought about the problem, produced a consultation paper, listened to the representations made to them, and improved on their first thoughts, which should be welcomed, not scorned, by the Labour party.

What needed to be done to protect women—as my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) pointed out, the issue does not exclusively affect women—from stalkers? We needed the threat of criminal proceedings in order to deter would-be offenders, and if they were not deterred, we needed to protect the victims by imprisoning stalkers if they were caught and convicted. We clearly needed such a law. We needed a different approach to the different kinds of stalking; we needed to distinguish between those who are just a nuisance, which is bad enough, and those who threaten violence and cause fear. We needed to recognise that some offenders act deliberately, believing that they are causing misery and knowing the effect of it, and some are sick and demented and honestly do not intend to cause misery. If the latter type of offender nevertheless causes misery by their actions, they cannot be caught, convicted and sentenced under the existing legislation.

There was a need not just to punish offenders but to prevent them offending in the first place. There was a need therefore not just for a criminal offence but a civil wrong, which can offer an injunction. If such an injunction is breached, it can be followed up by criminal sanctions. There was a need for defences to protect journalists. Some of us would wish that all journalists were not protected under the Bill, but journalists have a job to do, and as long as they do it in the confines of decency and restraint, they should be allowed to do so. If the Bill were too widely drafted, they would fall foul of it.

What about political canvassers? We call time and again at people's doors. First they are out; the second time they do not want to talk to us; the third time we do not have the answers to their questions; if they still want to talk to us the fourth time that we call, it is probably because we have those answers. We may even return a fifth or a sixth time to get some money from them. That might be considered harassment in some circumstances.

A harassment Bill must ensure that such nonsense does not take place—that is, not the nonsense of political canvassing, but the nonsense of prosecutions for political canvassing. There are also debt collectors, and the people who have already been mentioned, who are engaged in genuine surveillance. All those needs and approaches have helped to form the Bill, and that is thoroughly to be welcomed.

An undoubted improvement is the widening of the concept of stalking to cover harassment by neighbours, and racial harassment. Problems concerning bad neighbours are mentioned more often at my weekly surgeries now. In the old days we heard complaints about the inadequacy of social welfare and benefits, but the Government have been generous and such complaints have tailed off. More and more of the complaints that I hear from my constituents are about their bad neighbours.

We write to the local authority, but the authority says that it has no powers to do anything about bad neighbours. The Government have already passed a law to define some kinds of noise as a nuisance, but that is not always adequate, because the harassment does not always take the form of noise. Now we are introducing a measure that will give local authorities that run council housing estates another series of weapons to threaten those appalling people who make their neighbours' lives impossible.

Mr. McNamara: The hon. Gentleman talks about all the extra powers for local authorities, but local authorities will not get the extra money that they need to use those powers to enforce the legislation, or to employ the necessary people.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: That, as the hon. Gentleman must be aware, is totally irrelevant to the point that I am making. Perhaps he can raise it on the Adjournment of the House. He certainly may not raise it further in the middle of my speech.

I especially welcome the Government's move to deal further with the scourge of racism. The 1994 report by the Select Committee on Home Affairs made 38 recommendations for dealing with that serious problem, and I remember taking action against my own Government for not going far enough in accepting those recommendations, and for not proposing to deal more strongly with racism in response to our report.

Our recommendation 29 reads as follows:

"We recommend that the Public Order Act 1986 should be amended so that (a) section 6(4) should no longer require the prosecution to prove that the offender either intended to cause harassment or was aware that harassment may result, but instead should require the prosecution to prove that a reasonable person would have expected harassment, alarm or distress to be caused by his actions, (b) section 5(4) should allow a police officer to arrest on the basis of reasonable suspicion that an offence had been or was about to be committed, and (c) in section 5(6) the penalty should be increased to include a sentence of up to 12 months imprisonment, a more substantial fine, or both. We consider that these amendments will allow the courts to take into consideration and deal more effectively with those expressions of racism accompanying criminal acts to which we refer in paragraph 86."

I hope that I do my right hon. Friend the Minister of State no injustice, but I seem to remember that at the time he said that it was not possible to go further along the lines of the Committee's recommendations. I now warmly commend him and thank him for moving considerably further along those lines in the Bill, which, by extending the concept of stalking, deals with racial harassment. As a result there will be more weapons in the armoury of the criminal justice system for dealing with something that, when we seek to live together in a decent society, is one of the most insidious and hateful forms of human behaviour.

It is not only the victims of stalkers who have reason to thank the Government for the Bill. Harassed neighbours, whose numbers must run into thousands, if my constituency is anything to go by, and the racially harassed, of whom there must also be thousands, have reason to thank them too. So do all those who seek to bring order and justice to our society—whether that means the police, the probation service, the magistrates or the judges—and therefore the British public, who yearn for a society in which there is more law and order. I commend the Government for bringing forward a Bill that fulfils those wishes.

Mrs. Diana Maddock (Christchurch): Although the Bill is generally perceived to be about stalking, its tentacles are likely to spread far wider. In some ways it is like four Bills rolled into one—an anti-stalking Bill, a feuding neighbours Bill, a domestic violence Bill and a Bill that extends civil injunction remedies in such cases to the criminal courts.

It is therefore all the more disappointing and worrying that the timetable means that the Bill will be taken through all its stages in little more than 24 hours, on two consecutive days. My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has already made his views clear on that subject. Shortly before coming into the Chamber, I discovered that the Government may even be minded to push the whole thing through in one day.

During the debate on the Queen's Speech when my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) pledged to the Prime Minister my party's co-operation in the passage of the Bill, we did not envisage such a compacted and rushed debate. In my view, an attempt has been made to take advantage of our good will and concern.

We have heard that line already this afternoon. People have said that Opposition Members are against the Bill and are not co-operating, but "co-operating" does not mean failing to scrutinise the legislation properly.

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Lady says that there is a tight timetable for pushing the Bill through, but she should revise her opinion. As I understand it, two days have been allocated for debate, should that be necessary, although

[Mr. Maclean]

I hope that we shall not need the full time. I should have thought that that was ample time in which to scrutinise the legislation properly.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Gary Streeter): We can go through the night if the hon. Lady likes.

Mrs. Maddock: I hear facetious comments about sitting through the night. That is not what I meant. I believe that dealing with the Bill in such a short time will prevent all but the most rushed consultation. Drafting changes between Second Reading and Committee, and between Committee and Report, are part and parcel of the passage of most Bills through the House, and we all believe that they are the better for it. Clearly that will not happen in this case.

We would like several improvements to be made to the Bill. I have tabled amendments accordingly, and I hope that the Minister will respond sympathetically to them when the time comes. I am a little disappointed that an amendment that I tabled to allow a breach of a civil undertaking to be treated as an offence has not been selected. I believe that such a provision could save lengthy and complex legal arguments, and could take some of the acrimony out of cases, especially domestic violence cases.

I am advised that such a use of undertakings with legal force behind them could be extended to the criminal courts, too. In view of what the Minister has already said, I hope that he and his civil servants will consider the scope for the use of undertakings in both civil and criminal courts in the context of the Bill. I hope that we shall hear some response to that suggestion during our proceedings tonight.

I now move to a second area where we on the Liberal Democrat Benches are looking for some improvement. [HON. MEMBERS: "We?"] There are 26 of us somewhere in the building. As the Bill is drafted, the court cannot give any protection to victims pending the trial—which may be months away—short of remanding someone in custody, which would be expensive, or making it a bail condition, which does not carry the same full protection as the restraining order provisions in clause 5 from the time of sentencing onwards.

I hope that the Minister will consider whether it is possible to enable the court to make such an order when a trial is pending. One possible use of such an order would be to enable the court to make an order while proceedings are adjourned indefinitely, with the prospect perhaps of the defendant never having to come to court. The victim, therefore, would never have to relive the ordeal in the witness box. That would give the substantial protection of an explicit order, backed up with five years' imprisonment.

Given the wide scope of the Bill, I was surprised to read that the Government expect approximately 200 additional criminal cases a year to arise from it. Do the Government really believe that only four additional cases a week will arise in the whole of England and Wales as a result of the Bill? I can only imagine that they are considering only stalking cases and ignoring the wider effects of the Bill, which have been described fairly graphically this evening.

I have been advised by a lawyer active in this field that once the extent of the Bill is known there will be immense pressure on the police to take up the proceedings, particularly in neighbour disputes and domestic violence cases. In addition, the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) highlighted how important the Bill will be in cases of racial harassment. Only this week, the local beat officer in the centre of Christchurch—who often calls in at my office—said that she knew of two people in the constituency who were suffering a certain amount of harassment and who could be helped if the Bill were on the statute book. That is just one small part of England, so I suggest that the Government have underestimated when they state that there will be only 200 additional cases.

Stalking is a very serious matter, but it has only recently attracted media attention. It is a shame that, before anything can be deemed to be important, it has to become a media sensation. Many people still have the impression that stalking is little more than a nuisance and affects only celebrities who have in some way forfeited their right to privacy. The truth is much more complex. More than 3,000 people—young and old, men and women, those who are well known and those who are not—have been the victims of stalkers across the country in recent years. The true total figure is almost certainly higher. Stalking is not yet a crime, so the police have no criminal records on the matter.

Three months ago, there was a particularly appalling stalking case in the newspapers when a 37-year-old man—technically on a charge of causing grievous bodily harm, as that is the route that the police have often tried to use—was controversially acquitted by a court in London. The court had been told that he had harassed his victim for four years. He telephoned her up to 10 times a day, registered his car in her name and lurked outside her house—once with a machete. The man offered no defence, but the judge acquitted him because in his view there was insufficient evidence to prove intent to cause psychological harm, which was what the case turned on.

To get a criminal conviction at the moment, one must prove psychological distress equivalent to grievous bodily harm. Although this was achieved in one recent case—by Tracey Sant from Portsmouth—it has proved to be very difficult. I suspect that there was success in Portsmouth because of the assiduous work of the police there, and police officers from Portsmouth were the first to lobby me on this issue. They were incredibly frustrated at their inability to deal effectively with bad cases of stalking and harassment in the area.

Speaking last September at the Liberal Democrat annual conference in Brighton, I advocated a two-track approach to tackling the menace of stalking. This comprised a civil offence, allowing the courts to use restraining orders and award compensation, and a more serious criminal offence of molestation, where the stalker's persistent conduct causes harassment, alarm or distress, or leaves the person in fear of violence. I am pleased that the Bill broadly fits that description.

The need for legislation of this kind has been highlighted by groups including the Suzy Lamplugh Trust and the National Anti-Stalking and Harassment Campaign, both of which deserve credit for the fact that there is a Bill before us. The hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) also deserves credit for pushing the matter further, and I was disappointed that the Government stated in the summer that it would have been too complicated to amend her Stalking Bill. I believe that if the political will had been there, a Bill could have been on the statute book by now. The Police Federation has for a long time recognised the need for a Bill of this kind.

The Bill is long overdue. We support it, but that does not mean that we should not look closely at the legislation that we pass in Parliament. I cannot emphasise that enough. In my view, the Government have taken advantage of the good will of other parties and are rushing the Bill through the House. This could have been a good example of parties working together constructively, but I believe that the Government are yet again using it in a party political way before they look at the wider public interest.

The challenge for us all has been to achieve a balance between safeguarding civil liberties and producing effective legislation to deal with stalking and harassment. By rushing this Bill through, there is a real danger that we shall not achieve that balance in the best way that we could. I hope that the Government will honestly listen to the concerns raised in what has been a truncated debate.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): There is no doubt that there is a gap in the law, and every hon. Member will be aware of complaints from constituents suffering from anti-social neighbours. I know of an individual in my constituency—I will call him Brian—who has made life intolerable for his next-door neighbour, a widow living alone and in a permanent state of terror. My concern is that the Bill is not exactly the answer to a maiden's prayer.

The widow has been advised that her neighbour cannot be prosecuted until he commits some kind of physical offence against her. That is of little comfort. The gentleman clearly has a mental problem and is well known to the psychiatric services in my constituency. He is unaware of the problems that he is creating, so this may be unconscious or passive harassment. Indeed, the lady concerned is sympathetic to his plight.

As I understand it, the Bill will provide both a criminal and a civil sanction in such cases. But what will actually happen? Will it result in the man going to prison? I am not sure that that will be the solution to his difficulties at all. While I welcome the principle of a sanction against harassment, I am concerned that it will not necessarily provide all the remedies needed by people of the kind I have described. I am not sure that the Bill will automatically be a remedy for anti-social neighbours.

My second point relates to the definition of conduct that is reasonable. Will journalists really be exempt? Was it reasonable for journalists to go to parents of victims of the Dunblane incident and persistently approach them for interviews? Under the Bill, two incidents will be sufficient to spark off a prosecution, or at least police activity, and I am concerned about precisely whose definition of "reasonable" will apply. I suggest that what journalists from the Daily Mirror or the other tabloids consider to be reasonable is not what other people consider to be reasonable. I ask the Minister whether there is any way to narrow the definition.

With regard to targeting, will the Bill cover a specific victim who is anxious about approaches from or stalking by an identified person, or will it apply to entire communities? What happens in, let us say, a close? No doubt right hon. and hon. Members all know of cases in which a family with social difficulties or other problems have been moved into an otherwise peaceful neighbourhood and their behaviour—passive though it may be—causes enormous offence to other people living in the vicinity. I am not convinced that a criminal sanction will be the solution in such cases, and I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister could clarify that point.

The Bill will be used very widely indeed. I do not often agree with the Liberal Democrats, but when the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) said that there was some doubt about whether there would be just 200 cases a year, I was inclined to agree. Many people will look to the Bill to meet their particular anxiety and provide a remedy for it. I suspect that that will go way beyond celebrities or vulnerable women being stalked, and it will certainly go way beyond the problem of anti-social neighbours. A large number of sharp lawyers will see considerable opportunities in the Bill. If the courts are to look to Hansard to discover what definitions and cases are described, it is important that the Minister should try to give clear examples of cases for which a remedy will be available under the Bill.

Having said all that, I have clear reservations and I am not convinced that a penal sanction will automatically be the solution to anti-social behaviour. Nevertheless, the widow in my constituency to whom I have referred will certainly sleep much more easily when the Bill reaches the statute book and she knows that there is at least an element of protection for her. It is to be hoped that the Bill will also have a deterrent effect—that the mere threat of an injunction, or a visit from the police threatening a legal case, will be sufficient to curtail the misconduct.

To conclude, I wish the Bill a fair wind, but I hope that the Minister will be as graphic as possible in drawing the courts' attention to the kind of cases that will be covered.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) on having forced the Government to bring the Bill before the House. Having congratulated her on that, I have to say that this Bill is not the Bill that my hon. Friend originally introduced, nor is it the Bill that many of us thought we would support.

The Bill is widely drawn and I, for one, would have preferred to have it deal with offences of racial harassment, sexual harassment and anti-social behaviour that were specific, direct and defined, rather than have them as they are. Praise is due for their being in Bill, but the terms are extremely nebulous. The powers in the Bill will depend on, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, organic growth in the common law. Nothing frightens me more than that, having seen how some judges interpret current law. They might narrowly construe some of the provisions in a manner that might not have been intended by Parliament.

Furthermore, like the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason), I am concerned that clever lawyers might seek to extend the scope of the Bill so that it involves matters such as trade disputes, as was hinted at by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), and the role of investigative journalists. What is reasonable to one judge in the pursuance of a specific case might not be reasonable in respect of journalism. We are not talking only about invasions of the privacy of distinguished ex-members of the royal family or pop stars but about serious journalists carrying out serious research. The defence that is allowed depends on the subjective judgment of the individual judge who is directing the jury in a specific case. That causes me great concern.

I turn now to the Bill, specifically clause 4, and to why the Bill was originally introduced. I shall refer to a case in my constituency which was known as the "Orchard Park seige". Briefly, the facts of the case are as follows. A woman in my constituency had an affair that she brought to an end. Not satisfied with that, the man involved criminally assaulted her, bound her and left her in a ditch, for which he was sent to prison. He served a short time, got parole and was released; he then started to pester the woman. She complained to the police, who, she believes, did nothing about it, even though the man was out on licence and he was alleged to have boasted in a local pub about what he intended to do to the woman. She also believes that the police knew that he had what turned out to be an imitation firearm. Some of these matters are the subject of a Police Complaints Authority inquiry, but this is what the woman feels happened.

Eventually, the woman was seized outside her home and bundled into it. Her daughter arrived some time later and was also seized. The man appeared to fire his gun. He viciously assaulted the woman, broke her sternum and raped her about a dozen times. After 14 days, the police successfully ended the seige. I have nothing but praise for the way in which the police handled a difficult situation. They believed that the man was armed and they knew that he had hostages whom he might kill.

The jury in the subsequent trial acquitted the man of rape. It is hard to imagine how the woman could have acquiesced in sexual intercourse in her physical condition at that time, having, as she did, a broken breastbone. The police in that case regarded the jury's verdict as perverse.

One of the problems in the case was the fact that some of the rapes took place when the daughter was in the room although she was told to turn her face away. She was petrified about giving evidence; nothing that the police could say would persuade her to change her mind. Throughout the period after the arrest, a policewoman lived with mother and daughter, looking after them, giving them every encouragement. Nevertheless, the daughter refused to give evidence. I believe that to be one reason why the man was acquitted of rape. He was given about 10 years for criminal assault. Had the Bill been law at that time, the police might have been able to halt that tragic series of events. I say only "might", because many aspects of that case remain to be examined.

What priority will the police give to cases of harassment? What judgment will they exercise? Where will harassment appear in their hierarchy of offences—above or below burglary, above or below actual physical assault? What is their subjective judgment of the complaint made to them? The subjectivity will create a variety of problems.

Another type of harassment arose in that case. The woman gave evidence for two days, separated by a screen from the accused, but in the public gallery were all the members of the accused's family, looking down at her with hatred in their eyes. What sort of intimidation was that? It is an interesting question. If it went on for several days, would it amount to intimidation—harassment—under the Act, even if it took place in a court of law, where people were entitled to be? The woman certainly felt that their presence, looking at her in that way, hampered her in giving evidence, and her daughter felt that their presence intimidated her and prevented her from giving evidence.

Although the Crown Prosecution Service brought several charges of rape against the man, it did not bring them all; despite the perverse verdict, the CPS decided not to bring up the other cases. That woman had a horrific experience as a result of stalking and continued to feel deep resentment that she had been so abused, yet the man who did all that to her was not convicted of the violation of her womanhood, as he should have been.

Questions arise about matters that are not within the ambit of the Bill but arise from it. What should be the role of the social services in such a case? The woman was living in a council house. When the man was released on licence, she visited the local housing authority and asked to be transferred. She gave the reasons but did not go into all the details. Her request was therefore refused.

By chance, however, the man had been allocated a flat that directly overlooked the house in which the woman lived. She was conscious of him always being there, overlooking where she lived, and she was conscious of his actions. The local housing authority felt that it could not move him, because it was unaware of his record, and it did not feel that the woman had sufficient grounds to be moved, because, rightly or wrongly, she felt that she could not give all the details of what had happened to her. There is a need, therefore, for housing associations, local authorities and the social services to take into account the effects of harassment on people in vulnerable situations, especially women.

My constituent asked me to make those points in the debate because of her concern, not only about what had happened to her but about what might happen to other women in other circumstances. I welcome the Bill in so far as it fulfils the purpose of the Stalking Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen, but not in so far as it poses enormously extended threats to civil liberties as a result of what the Government have done with it.

We welcome the aspects of the Bill designed to try to overcome a serious and grievous matter affecting many women in this country—and also, strangely enough, men. As the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) said, stalking is a frequent problem. I hope that the knowledge that the Bill exists and that the powers exist under the Bill will encourage women to complain to the police. Let us hope that the police devote sufficient priority to the matter to take action on such cases, because failure to do so affects the well-being not only of the woman but of her family, her extended family and the whole community.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Legislation that is rushed through the House tends to be bad legislation. On this occasion, there was no need for a rush, but we have a Home Secretary who always seeks party advantage in preference to good government.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) introduced her Stalking Bill, the Government would have had no difficulty in ensuring that it became a good Bill and passed through the House; but no—the Government preferred to block it and claim that they were doing something different.

That is the Bill's tragedy. By the time my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen had introduced her Bill, it was obvious that stalking had become a problem and needed to be tackled. When a private Member introduces a Bill, it receives a Second Reading and goes into Committee. Then discussions take place between the promoter and the Government. Almost every clause of the original Bill is dropped, a series of new clauses appears and the Bill emerges from Committee, improved yet managing to fulfil the promoter's original intention.

If such proper scrutiny had taken place, we would now have a useful measure on the statute book. Sadly, the Home Secretary did not want the chance of a Labour Member being responsible for passing legislation on stalking; he wanted to claim the credit. He produced a discussion document. There was a lengthy charade about whether the Government would promote legislation. Finally, we got the Bill. We have 10 days in which to examine it.

I do not complain that hon. Members have only 10 days in which to examine the Bill, but I do complain that people outside this place have little time in which to do so. It is surprising how difficult it is to get hold of a Bill like this, to study it, to work out whether it will meet one's circumstances and to lobby Members of Parliament to ensure that it does the task.

Holding Report stage immediately after Committee stage does not provide enough time—not because, in Committee, Members often do a great deal to improve the Bill, but because often the amendments that they table force Ministers into a discussion with civil servants and draftspersons, to make the Bill that crucial bit better. I suspect that, if we rush this legislation through, we shall not produce a good Bill.

I am disappointed that the Home Secretary's approach is to produce a vague Bill, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen said, will be filled out as a result of case law. But we are told that there is a problem now, and we want to provide some certainty for people who are distressed and upset about being stalked. They should be relieved now, without having to take their case all the way to the Appeal Court. My hon. Friend attempted to make the original Bill clear so that anybody could understand it.

If a police officer trying to advise somebody picks up this Bill, he cannot say that certain behaviour is all right, because it will have to be tested in the courts. This is not a particularly good document for the police to use; it is certainly not a good document for a lawyer to use when advising somebody. Lawyers always say "on the one hand" and "on the other hand". We want clarity and we do not get it from this Bill.

My next complaint is that the problem will not be solved simply by changing the law; we need more resources. The Government claim that very few cases will be involved. If that is so, the legislation will not meet the needs that exist out there in the country. If there are more cases than the Government say, from where will the resources come? Either the police will not use the legislation, in which case there is no point in us passing it, or they will have to take resources from somewhere else. If the legislation is to work, we need more resources.

I wish to ask the Home Secretary about the exemption if someone is behaving reasonably. Many people are involved in harassing other people and do it perfectly legitimately. The Leader of the Opposition tries to harass the Prime Minister, and I am sure that no one would complain about that. Most Members of Parliament try to harass Ministers, and it is our job to do so. Most hon. Members will admit to harassing a fair number of civil servants and officials in their constituencies to get justice for their constituents.

The housing officers in Thameside and Stockport must sometimes feel, when I ring them up and bend their ears, that I am harassing and pressing them. I think that that is perfectly legitimate and that I could defend my behaviour. Most people would say that it is reasonable for a Member of Parliament to act in that way on behalf of his or her constituents to put right an injustice.

What about a constituent who tries to put right an injustice for himself? Does he has the same defence? This seems to be one of the problems. If someone can say that he is a debt collector and operating as such, his behaviour will be acceptable when he harasses people to pay their debts. But what happens if an individual tries to get people to settle their debts?

Recently, a constituent had some work done by a local builder whose standard of work was appalling. He went to the small claims court and was awarded money, but then the builder said that he was not Joe Bloggs the builder but John Jones the builder. Everyone knows the trick: builders move easily from one business to the next, leaving their debts behind them. My constituent followed that individual around for a week and every person that the builder talked to was handed a note by my constituent explaining his claim for money. Eventually, he got his money. I think that that was harassment, but justified harassment. I am concerned that my constituent, acting as an individual to try to get that money, could not claim that he was a professional debt collector.

What about the Child Support Agency? That government body has the right to sue people for money, but what about an individual who feels that the CSA is not doing enough and wants to provide extra evidence to it? Would that be legitimate?

What about journalists? Moreover, when is a journalist a journalist, and when is he not? If he or she has full-time paid employment, there will be little doubt, but if he or she is freelance there are difficulties. A particular problem for a journalist is that, with hindsight, all sorts of things can be seen to be unreasonable but at the time it may have seemed to the journalist that they were reasonable.

What about writers? We often read articles in newspapers saying that a certain biography was authorised and they usually say what a nice person the subject was, but how legitimately can someone trying to produce an unauthorised biography go about collecting information under this legislation, and when does it become harassment?

I could give many more examples, but the Government must deal with the question of the defence of someone pursuing a legitimate occupation.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that he would be on to a better point if he explained that, as the word "reasonable" is understood in different ways by different people in different circumstances, the real criticism of this part of the Bill is that it will provide endless work for lawyers, at considerable public cost?

Mr. Bennett: I fully accept that point. As I said at the beginning, it is important to be clear so that people know what they are entitled to do. They should not have to wait until lawyers have made a lot of money out of this matter and until there have been 20 cases over five or six years to establish what the law is.

It was claimed that the Bill would cover harassment by groups. I am not sure how that will work, and I hope that the Minister will explain. The last two cases of racial harassment with which I dealt involved not just one individual but a group of people—five or six—living in the same street who all behaved in a racist way towards someone attempting to move into that street. I should have thought that one or two of the people involved might be involved in two or more incidents, but I suspect that encouragement of collective action was the problem.

More recently, I tried to persuade one of my constituents to give evidence in a particularly nasty case. The intimidation that he suffered as a witness was carried out not by one individual but by a group of people who all believed that they liked the accused person and wanted to make things as difficult as possible for anybody acting as a witness.

I want a clear statement from the Home Secretary that the Bill will not be used against protesters. This country has always believed in freedom of speech and freedom to demonstrate. There seems to be a narrow line between protesting and demonstrating, and harassment. I hope that the Minister will make that clear.

I wish to tell the House about two incidents in my constituency where I believe that what is needed are resources rather than legislation. Not long ago, a reasonable couple came to see me at my advice bureau in Reddish and said what terrible neighbours they had. There had been a dispute about a boundary fence and their neighbour had acted utterly unreasonably and outrageously. I must admit that I believed that, from what was described to me, the neighbour had behaved outrageously. I went on to my second advice bureau, which I do in the evening, at Denton, where another reasonable couple came to see me and said that their neighbours were utterly unreasonable and had behaved outrageously. The two couples lived next door to each other and were describing each other. Had I heard only one story, I would have been convinced that someone should take action on that couple's behalf against the neighbours.

The problem with those situations is that there is a good chance that the police or lawyers will hear only one side of the story. The only advice I could give to the couples once I knew the situation was that they should move, but of course both couples thought that the other couple should move. It will be difficult to resolve the issue satisfactorily, although the four people are all reasonable except when involved in that neighbours' dispute. If we had the resources for a conciliation service, it could bring the four together and explain to them all that they are harassing their neighbours and that, if they cannot come to some accommodation, the only solution is for one pair to move.

The final example I wish to mention is that of a young lady who came to see me with a worrying case. She described how she was being followed and said that there were people spying on her. I assumed, as she talked, that she was suffering from paranoia and that she did not have a case, but I agreed to take it up with the police and social security. I wrote to both services asking them to confirm that they were not carrying out surveillance and, much to my surprise, someone from the social security fraud squad rang me up and said, "Look, I should not really tell you this, but we have made a terrible mistake in this case. We have been carrying out surveillance because we thought she was claiming benefit while she was working, but we now know the whole history of the case. The police were making inquiries because they thought that she was involved in illegal activities." In that case, because I found out the full story, I was able to tell my constituent that there had been a mistake, people had been following her for what they thought were legitimate reasons and it would all stop.

The problem with the legislation is that various people are exempt, but how will individuals be told that whoever is following them is exempt? That will be difficult, because people might have legitimate worries that they are being harassed and the only way to tell them that that is not happening would be to say that a government agency had been carrying out surveillance on them and causing them upset unnecessarily. The Government must consider how information will be passed on in those circumstances to reassure people that what they believe to be harassment is not harassment, but the Government legitimately checking up on them. In most cases, either the surveillance will result in a prosecution because the person was committing some offence or that person can be assured that it has stopped.

It is unfortunate that the measure is being rushed through the House. We should have had much more time for scrutiny. I hope that we can pursue some of the amendments and that, as has happened so often when legislation has been rushed through the House, the real scrutiny will take place in the House of Lords. I hope that the Lords will show more vigour than is likely to be shown in the Commons.

Ms Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen): I wish to start by thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), the Home Secretary and everyone who has contributed to the debate for their gracious comments about my attempts earlier this year to try to do something about the important issue of stalking. I also wish to place on record the fact that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn made clear, we support the Bill and are anxious to see it on the statute book as quickly as possible.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), who is not in his place, referred to men being stalked. He is right; and I have corresponded with a number of men who have been stalked. The problem is predominantly faced by women, but I notice that, in The Independent the other day, there was a letter from a woman who was being stalked by another woman. Clearly the crime is no respecter of gender.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) spoke about the extent of agreement on the Bill, and I endorse his comments. It is welcome when we are able to co-operate across the Floor of the House, and I am sure that the public would welcome it if we did it a bit more often. My hon. Friend is well known for his long interest in the private security industry. He has continued to press for regulation of that industry, as recommended by the Home Affairs Select Committee, which is chaired by the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence). We hope that, one day, the Government will introduce such regulation.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton gave me much encouragement in my efforts, and I am grateful. I learned much from him when I was a member of the Select Committee that he chairs so expertly, but he referred disingenuously to my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn as causing mischief. I can assure him that that was not the intention of my hon. Friend. There is still some concern that the Bill will cause problems for journalists. I have a copy of a letter from the Guild of Editors, which states:

"The Guild remains concerned at the ease with which the Bill's provisions could be used to curb the media rather than protect the victims of stalking."

May I say to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock)—who has temporarily left her place—how much I welcome her party's support for action to tackle stalking, which seemed to appear at its recent annual conference. The hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) mentioned the problem of neighbours. He might like to read the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn in our "Quiet Life" document, which would tackle the neighbour problems of which he spoke.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) spoke, rightly, of the need for greater detail and stricter definition. None of us could have failed to be moved by his horrific tale about the case in his constituency. Like him, I hope that women will be encouraged to go to the police and to complain as a result of this and, I hope, future legislation. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) spoke about private Members' Bills and how they have sometimes managed to reach the statute book with the right spirit of cross-party co-operation. I could not agree more with what he said.

It is unusual, but welcome, that, in a Chamber so dominated by men, we should debate an issue of serious concern to women. The Police Federation estimates that 3,000 people fall victim to stalkers every year and that the overwhelming majority of them are women. As with domestic violence—also largely a crime committed by men against women—there has perhaps been a reluctance for too long to address the menace of stalking.

I am sure that those witnessing the debate today, especially the victims of stalkers, wonder why it has taken so long to get round to doing anything about a problem that causes such misery to thousands of women. Women have seen their relationships torn apart and their children taken into care because they have suffered such enormous psychological damage that they can no longer cope. Women have been made afraid to venture out alone and too frightened to pick up the telephone. Women's lives have been left in tatters by the torment they have suffered at the hands of stalkers.

Each year, the women on the Opposition Benches try to mark International Women's Day by highlighting issues of concern to women. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) secured a slot for a ten-minute Bill in March. In a spirit that I suspect is more common among Labour Members than Conservative, she asked me to use it to introduce a Bill to combat stalking. That Bill, as we know, was blocked by the Government on 10 May. I recently asked the Home Secretary why the Government felt that any differences between us about the contents of my Bill could not have been resolved in Committee. He replied that "there was no time and there would not have been full and proper consultation."—[Official Report, 28 October 1996; Vol. 284, c. 336.]

However, it has taken the Government a full nine months to come forward with their proposals.

If a week is a long time in politics, nine months must have seemed like an eternity for the victims of stalkers. As for consultation, the Home Secretary and his colleagues know that we consulted widely on my Bill before it was published. We took advice from the police, from lawyers who had been involved in stalking cases, from the Home Secretary's officials at the Home Office—at the express invitation of the Minister of State—from the Lord Chancellor, from the Suzy Lamplugh Trust and from the national anti-stalking and harassment campaign. Most important, we consulted the victims of stalkers. We even consulted Conservative Members, and I have their replies in front of me. The hon. and learned Member for Burton made a number of suggestions that we were careful to include in the final draft.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) wrote to me on 2 May, commenting on the draft Bill that I had sent her. She said:

"Dear Janet, Thank you for your note re: Stalking. It looks fine to me!"

In his letter to me of 4 May, the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby) said :

"Thank you for sending me a copy of your draft Bill on stalking. I think this is a very good effort and provides a very good basis for discussion with the Minister at the Home Office."

What did the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), say about the Bill, for he too was sent a draft of it on 22 April, two weeks before it was published? He declined to comment until the eve of the Second Reading—no doubt he was consulting. He said that he regretted that the scope of my Bill was "too wide". He continued:

"It could mean that innocent people going about their lawful business would find themselves branded as criminals."

He also said:

"I do not think there is a political difference between us."

Is he not aware that it is widely believed that a political difference prevented the Government from working with us nine months ago to provide relief for the victims of stalking?

It is also widely believed that the Home Secretary could not stomach the idea of backing a Labour Bill. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates), the duty Government Whip, was moved to shout, "Object," on 10 May to block our Stalking Bill. He has now received his reward and stepped neatly into the ministerial shoes of the dissembling hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts).

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): That is not worthy of the hon. Lady.

Ms Anderson: If the hon. Gentleman listens, he might learn something. The hon. Member for Havant truly learned the lesson: "Never put in writing what you would not wish to see reprinted on the front page of The Sun."

[Ms Anderson]

We cannot know how many victims could have been helped sooner. In the absence of a specific anti-stalking law, it has been difficult for victims to seek redress other than through charges such as grievous bodily harm. That has inevitably taken up hours of the courts' time while lawyers argued that the charge covered psychological harm. It worked in the case of Peri Southall, who was stalked by Clarence Morris; he was found guilty. It worked also for Tracy Sant, who had endured three years of mental torture during a campaign of harassment and intimidation by Anthony Burstow, but it took five days of tortuous legal wrangling to get a conviction.

It did not work for Margaret Bent, who was allegedly stalked by Dennis Chambers during an unrelenting four-year campaign that began simply after he saw her in the street. Dennis Chambers, who offered no defence to the charge of causing Miss Bent grievous bodily harm, walked free and Margaret Bent faced the added ordeal of being cross-examined by Chambers, who chose to defend himself. It is no wonder that Margaret's mother was moved to say:

"I hope the judge and the jury some day experience what I have experienced with my daughter. He made her life a hell for four years, not only hers but everyone in her family and her friends".

Margaret Bent is one woman who might have been sleeping easier in her bed tonight if something had been done sooner to help the victims of stalking. However, the stalking menace was ideal for the kind of action that the Home Secretary likes to unveil at Conservative party conferences—and that is what he did.

Mr. Maclean: This is unnecessary and stupid.

Ms Anderson: If the Minister will be more patient, he will understand my reasons for repeating the Home Secretary's words. At the party conference, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said:

"There is one group of offenders from whom the public needs special protection. Stalkers. They can make a woman's life a misery . . . Terrified prisoners of someone else's obsession. We need quick and effective remedies for the less serious cases. And tough sanctions for the most serious. And today I can announce that we shall have them. Women deserve that protection . . . And I will make sure they get it."

The explanatory note for editors, appended to the Home Secretary's speech, clearly stated:

"The Government proposes to deal with the menace of stalking through a combination of civil and criminal remedies".

We could have been forgiven for believing that the much-trumpeted commitment would be included in the Queen's Speech—that the Government might keep their promise and bring forward their own legislation—but no, the measure was consigned to a private Member's Bill.

How strange it is that what could not be achieved by a private Member's Bill many months before would now be tackled in precisely that manner. Only when my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition showed his readiness to put party politics aside, was the Prime Minister forced to concede that the Government would introduce their own legislation. I suspect that that was as much a surprise for the Home Secretary as it was for us.

At last we have the Bill before us today. In May, the Home Secretary said:

"the Government had been preparing its own legislation to counter the menace of stalking for some time".

He described my Bill as, "rushed, botched and unworkable" but, in the end, he has brought forward a Bill that is remarkably similar. In May, the Home Secretary said:

"as soon as we are satisfied that we have a workable definition of the crime, we will legislate".

Surprisingly, he has now introduced a Bill with practically no definition at all. Seemingly any activity that a court "reasonably" decides is harassment is just that, and if a court thinks that certain activities were causing fear of violence, they were. Ministers claimed that our definition was unworkable, but theirs is virtually non-existent.

There can be no clearer example of the Opposition leading where the Government have failed to act. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition famously said, he leads his party—in contrast to the Prime Minister, who follows his. On guns, knives, paedophiles, criminally anti-social neighbours and stalking, Labour has led the way. I am sure that the lesson is not lost on a country that looks increasingly to the Opposition for constructive law and order solutions.

Mr. Howard: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate.

We have just heard a ludicrous speech that was unworthy of the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson). She claimed credit a moment ago for the Leader of the Opposition, who she said had put party politics aside in his speech on the Loyal Address. That accusation could never be levelled at the hon. Lady in light of her contribution.

The truth about the matter that we are debating this evening is that stalking is a serious menace from which countless women, in particular, suffer greatly. Nothing could do more harm to those women than to cobble together an unprepared Bill, rush it on to the statute book, and pretend that it offered them relief. Earlier today, I paid tribute to the hon. Lady and congratulated her on raising the matter last year in her private Member's Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby) said in his letter—which the hon. Lady quoted in her speech—the Bill provided a useful basis for discussion with Ministers.

We discussed the issue with her, but her Bill would not have provided an adequate statutory remedy to the mischief with which we all want to deal. It was deficient in a number of respects, which I identified with some precision earlier this afternoon. It does no one any justice to gather an absolute farrago of inaccuracies in an attempt to demonstrate that the Government's reaction to the hon. Lady's Bill last year was based on a desire—the hon. Lady made this specific accusation—not to support an Opposition private Member's Bill. What utter nonsense.

Ms Janet Anderson: It is not.

Mr. Howard: Let me give the hon. Lady an example from this Session. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) introduced a private Member's Bill on knives. He and the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, "We should like to introduce a Bill on knives, and this is the Bill we want." They showed us the Bill and we said,

"We don't think much of your Bill, because we don't think it would work. We are keen to help you if you want to put a sensible measure to deal with knives on the statute book, and we will provide you with a Bill." That is exactly what we did.

With the Government's full support, the hon. Gentleman, who came first in the private Members' ballot—a Labour Member—introduced a Bill on knives, which was drafted and proposed by the Government. We do not have the slightest difficulty supporting a Bill proposed by a Labour Member. To suggest the contrary is completely untrue from start to finish. The hon. Lady should know that, and she should know better than to make disgraceful accusations, as she did during her appalling speech.

The hon. Lady is giggling away on the Front Bench. She had the temerity to claim that she had consulted the National Anti-stalking and Harassment Campaign. I have the specific authority of its director to say that she rejects very strongly the idea that the hon. Lady consulted that body about her stalking proposals. That was simply not the case, and that fact should be placed on the record.

I remind the hon. Lady exactly why her Bill was defective. In the first place, it would not have provided a defence for people who are engaged in legitimate activities, such as journalists and others who have been mentioned by Opposition Members, including the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George). In that respect, it was too wide. We had to give the matter a great deal of thought, and to consult carefully before we were able to propose a solution to that problem.

In another respect, the hon. Lady's Bill was too narrow, because it proceeded by way of a list of examples of conduct that would constitute stalking. The trouble with such a list is that, although the Bill may say—as hers did—that the list is without prejudice to the generality of the scope of the clause, such matters are subject to principles of statutory construction and interpretation.

One of those principles—if the hon. Lady is interested—is called the ejusdem generis rule, which requires such a list to be construed as though it could be extended to cover things of the same nature as those in the list. As the list in the hon. Lady's Bill concentrated entirely on activities characteristic of classic stalking, it would not have covered activities that constitute racial harassment or that come under the heading of harassment of one neighbour by another. That is the truth of the matter.

Ms Anderson: That was never intended.

Mr. Howard: In that case, the world at large will welcome the fact that our Bill does intend to cover such activities.

Ms Anderson: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howard: No, not until I have finished making this point.

Many people will welcome the fact that our Bill gives protection to victims of racial harassment and to the victims of the activities of noisy neighbours. They will not have counted it an advantage of the hon. Lady's Bill that it excluded such activities.

Ms Anderson: May I reaffirm what the right hon. and learned Gentleman clearly understands? I want to put on record the fact that my Bill was never intended to deal with the problems of criminally anti-social neighbours and racial harassment. As I am sure he knows, the Opposition have for some time had proposals on those matters. We are pleased that the Government have at last addressed those problems and have copied many of our proposals.

Mr. Howard: Let me explain the deficiencies of the hon. Lady's approach in words that are more pointed and eloquent than any I could devise. At the Suzy Lamplugh Trust conference in October, a victim of a stalker told my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, "If you have a list of activities which you ban, my stalker will simply sit down and work out another activity with which to torment me." That was the deficiency of the hon. Lady's Bill, and the present Bill seeks to remedy that.

Ms Anderson rose—

Mr. Howard: I believe that the Bill does remedy that deficiency, which is why it was worth waiting—

Ms Anderson rose—

Mr. Howard: I shall give way in a moment.

It was worth waiting a few months—not many months—to prepare proper and effective legislation, which I believe we have achieved with our Bill.

Ms Anderson: I refer the Home Secretary to the definition in my Bill. Indeed it had a list—it drew on the experience of other countries that have anti-stalking laws—but it was not exhaustive. We were careful to include a catch-all phrase, which was presumably why he said at the time that the Bill was drawn too widely. It referred to a person who "does any other act or acts in connection with another person so as to be reasonably likely to cause that other person to feel harassed, alarmed, distressed"

I emphasise the fact that the list was not exhaustive. Perhaps the victim who spoke to the Minister of State at the conference did not understand that.

Mr. Howard: I fear that it is the hon. Lady who does not understand. I shall explain it to her yet again. We said that her Bill was too wide—not because of the clause to which she has just referred, but because it did not provide a defence to people engaged in legitimate activities. I have already said that twice, and this is the third time. I shall say it a fourth time if necessary, but that is the truth of the matter.

The clause to which the hon. Lady referred would not have provided a solution to the problem that I identified earlier. Lists are construed according to the nature of the activities that are put in them. That is the deficiency of the list approach, which is why we said, correctly, that the hon. Lady's Bill was too narrow in that respect.

Mr. McNamara: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is jumping from place to place. He referred to the ejusdem generis rule in relation to racial harassment. My hon. Friend's Bill stated specifically that all other matters that reflect stalking would be included. The ejusdem generis rule would have covered that.

Mr. Howard: It would not have covered that, because the ejusdem generis rule means that the list is interpreted and constructed in accordance with the nature of the activities that are identified. It is the hon. Gentleman who is rushing about all over the place. He is trying to contend that his hon. Friend's Bill would have covered racial harassment. The hon. Lady herself has just argued that she never intended that her Bill should cover racial harassment. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Mr. McNamara: I did not say that. I specifically said to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he was jumping the ground by saying that my hon. Friend's Bill was not covered by the rule because it included racial harassment. We said specifically that it did not include racial harassment, so the rule applied.

Mr. Howard: That is precisely why the Bill was too narrow. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman is getting so excited about that. It was too narrow because it did not cover those other activities from which people suffer a great deal of harm, which give rise to a great deal of mischief and for which Parliament should provide a remedy. That is why our Bill deals with those aspects of the mischief, and specifically provides remedies for those problems.

Mr. George Howarth rose—

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman wants to intervene to help his hon. Friend.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend needs no help at all. Indeed, given that she was making, as it were, her maiden speech from the Dispatch Box, I think that she has done very well. Certainly she does not need my help; my purpose is to help the Home Secretary.

Will the Home Secretary make it clear once and for all whether he thinks that the scope of my hon. Friend's Bill was too wide, or whether he thinks that it was too narrow? He has made both allegations in the space of two minutes. [Interruption.] Conservative Members do not like to hear this, but the Home Secretary said that my hon. Friend's Bill was defective in that it would not allow people going about their legitimate business to do so. What does he think was the purpose of clause 4 of that Bill? The clause stated:

"No person acting under statutory or other lawful authority insofar as he acts within that authority shall be guilty of an offence under this Act."

Does that not constitute an exception and a defence? Precisely the problem that the Home Secretary said existed in my hon. Friend's Bill was covered in it.

Mr. Howard: I will explain—for, I think, the fifth time. The hon. Lady's Bill was too wide in one respect, and too narrow in another. It was too narrow because of the list, as I have just said, and it was too wide because it did not provide a defence for those who were engaged in legitimate activities but not under any statutory authority. A journalist who may be pursuing an investigation is certainly not acting under any such authority. This Bill, however, deals specifically with the matter by setting a standard: whether it is reasonable for someone to act in such a way in the circumstances. That is entirely different from the misconceived approach adopted in the hon. Lady's Bill, which would not have worked. [Interruption.] The approach to which the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) keeps referring would not have achieved that objective, for reasons that I have explained very clearly.

I owe the hon. Lady an apology: I had not appreciated that this was her maiden speech from the Front Bench. I welcome her to the Front Bench, and trust that the other speeches that she will make from it in due course will be a substantial improvement on her effort tonight.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I fear that my right hon. and learned Friend is, characteristically, being too kind to the hon. Lady. Did her Bill not contain two serious deficiencies that he has not mentioned? It would have made the same penalty available for both stalking causing harassment and the other offence of stalking causing fear for safety, which would obviously not have been very sensible. Moreover, the hon. Lady's Bill was intended to reverse the burden of proof: the defence would have had to prove that the defendant did not know that his actions would have the alleged effect. That would have delayed the Bill considerably, because if anything causes controversy in this place, it is the reversal of the burden of proof.

Mr. Howard: My hon. and learned Friend is right, but it would take me a long time to list all the many imperfections in the hon. Lady's Bill. I was concentrating on the main structural weaknesses—the weaknesses of principle—and trying to explain why we needed to take some time to consider these matters carefully and to consult widely. That is the basis on which we have been able to present proposals that will not disappoint the many women who suffer as a result of the activities that the legislation is designed to remedy. Our proposals will not dash their hopes, or give rise to false hopes by enacting legislation that would be imperfect and would not work; they will lead to the enactment of effective legislation that will give those women—and not only women, as we have heard—the remedy to which they are entitled.

On that basis, I commend the Bill to the House. I believe that it will significantly help victims of the kind of activity that gives concern to hon. Members in all parties.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Coe.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee.

[DAME JANET FOOKES in the Chair]

Clause 1

PROHIBITION OF HARASSMENT

7.55 pm

Mr. Bennett: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 8, leave out "or ought to know".

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 22, in page 1, line 10, leave out subsection (2).

No. 12, in page 1, line 13, at end insert—

'(2A) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection 2 above, a person pursues a course of conduct amounting to harassment if he:

(a) follows, loiters near, watches or approaches another person;

(b) telephones (which for the avoidance of doubt shall include telephoning a person but remaining silent during the call), contacts by other electronic means, or otherwise contacts another person;

(c) loiters near, watches, approaches or enters a place where another person lives works or repeatedly visits;

(d) interferes with property which does not belong to him and is in the possession of another person;

(e) leaves offensive, unwarranted or unsolicited material at a place where another person lives, works or regularly visits; or

(f) gives offensive, unwarranted or unsolicited material to another person so as to be reasonably likely to cause that other person to feel harassed, alarmed, distressed or to fear for his safety or for that of one or more third persons to whom he has a duty of protection or with whom he is associated.'.

No. 5, in clause 4, clause 4, page 2, line 27, leave out 'or ought to know'.

No. 18, in clause 4, page 2, line 33, at end insert—

'(2A) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2) above, a person pursues a course of conduct for the purposes of this section when he persistently behaves in any of the ways mentioned in section 1 (2) or (2A) above'.

No. 9, in clause 7, clause 7, page 3, leave out lines 39 and 40.

No. 10, in clause 7, page 3, line 41, leave out 'two' and insert 'three'.

Mr. Bennett: This brings us straight back to one of the central issues that featured on Second Reading—the question whether the Government's approach is the best, or whether something clearer and more specific is needed.

Clause 1(1)(b) states that a person must not pursue a course of conduct "which he knows" amounts to harassment. There is clearly no problem with that except when someone wishes to prosecute, when it will be extremely difficult to prove intent. The Government therefore added the catch-all "or ought to know"—which poses the difficult question of what someone "ought to know". That is made conditional on subsection (2), which deals with the word "harassment", and on subsection (3), which deals with the question of reversing proof and proving that what was done was reasonable. That was the basis of the castigation that we heard from the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence).

I do not think that the Government's approach is the best. I think that it would be far better for us to try to provide certainty in legislation, rather than leaving it to be provided in case law resulting from a series of cases based on what constitutes harassment, what is reasonable and what someone ought to know.

Obviously, there are alternative approaches. Amendment No. 12 puts back the list that was in the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson). If the Government really want to deal with the problem, they should consider a compromise between their approach and that of my hon. Friend, making it easy for a person to understand that, if he pursues a certain course of conduct, he can be accused of harassment, that he will have committed an offence and that he can be punished for it.

The Home Secretary has argued that, if a list is included, the court must take notice of it, and will take less notice of any catch-all at the end of the list. If he really feels that he cannot put such a list in the Bill, he should look to the various devices that Parliament comes up with—codes of practice, regulations and guidance—so that, if he insists on a catch-all phrase, there is a simple way for a police officer to explain to someone that, if he continues to behave in such a way, he will be involved in harassment, and a lawyer giving advice will have a document allowing him to say, "This looks as though it would fall foul of the law."

Therefore, in practice, the Government have not really solved the problems by going for a wide definition using the phrases "ought to know", "harassment" and "reasonable". That will be a marvellous area for lawyers to work over for many years. Instead of solving the problems of someone being stalked, it may mean that persons face much more upset and worry because their court case will become long running.

I therefore hope that, in responding to this group of amendments, the Government will recognise that there is a problem with the clause and will clarify it.

8 pm

Mr. Maclean: Amendment No. 1 would fundamentally damage the Bill's effectiveness. The great difficulty in using existing law to prevent harassing conduct is that the stalker will not always intend to cause harassment. That is why we ensured in clause 1 that a person is prohibited from pursuing a course of conduct, not only where he knows that it causes harassment, but where he ought to know that harassment would be caused. A person ought to know that that course of conduct would amount to harassment in circumstances where a reasonable person, in possession of the same information, would think that the course of conduct amounted to harassment of the other person.

The amendment serves to ensure merely that the offence of causing harassment will apply only where intent could be proved. That would go no further than existing laws, which both victims' organisations and the police agree are inadequate to deal with stalkers who claim that they do not intend to cause harassment to their victim. Victims of stalking need protection against such stalkers. Clause 1 provides it. We cannot accept any amendment that weakens that position.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) commented that the Home Secretary had said that the list system would mean that the courts would take less notice of the catch-all at the end of the list. That is not exactly the correct interpretation. It is not that the courts would take less notice of the so-called catch-all at the end of the list, but that, under the courts' rules of construction and interpretation, they would interpret that catch-all as being in the same generic list as the actual list. It would cease, therefore, to be a general catch-all and be regarded as a narrowly defined catch-all of exactly the activities specified in the list.

[Mr. Maclean]

I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's amendment, which would fundamentally weaken the Bill, and I hope that he will see fit to withdraw it.

Mr. Bennett: On a point of order, Dame Janet. From the list that I have, I thought that a whole series of other amendments were grouped with amendment No. 1. Is that correct?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Yes it is. Indeed the hon. Gentleman will recall that, when I first called amendment No. 1 out, I mentioned that it was grouped with others. It is not a matter for the occupant of the Chair to decide how much a Member or a Minister shall say about the other amendments in the group.

Mr. Bennett: Further to that point of order, Dame Janet. The point was that I had thought that my hon. Friends on the Front Bench might have wanted to speak to their amendments that are grouped with amendment No. 1. I was not sure that they were aware that they were.

Ms Janet Anderson: We do not intend to press this to a vote, but we would like to explore the thinking behind the Bill's definition and how the Government think that it might work in practice.

Given some of the comments by Conservative Members about our amendments, may I specifically refer them to a letter from the Association of County Councils, which says that its

"worry about the Bill as drafted is that it is drawn in very wide terms. For example, 'harassment' is not specifically defined, and it appears that the Bill covers harassment whether in the home, the workplace, on the streets, etc. I am not saying that this is wrong, merely that it does not seem clear."

I have already mentioned that the Guild of British Newspaper Editors is concerned about the effect on the media.

May I also reiterate the views of the Suzy Lamplugh Trust, which, as we all know, has long taken an interest in this issue. A letter from Anne Strahan, the trust's projects and research manager, apologises to me for her comments to the Daily Mail.

Mr. Maclean: We have had this before.

Ms Anderson: Yes, but, believe me, it is worth repeating, if the Minister will just be patient.

The letter states:

"At the time of speaking to the Daily Mail yesterday, I misunderstood the intention of the amendments within the Bill, assuming these amendments to override the more general nature of the Bill. As an extra provision to the Bill, these amendments would in fact strengthen rather than weaken the Bill.

The Trust is very pleased that Labour are still working to improve the Bill".

I hope therefore that Minister will understand that that is the spirit in which I have tabled the amendments.

The amendments seek to add to the definitions laid out for the lower offence of harassment and the higher offence of causing fear of violence. I know that the Home Secretary recognises the need to get the definition right when legislating to combat the menace of stalking. On 10 May, in an interview on "The World at One", he said:

"Stalking is a particularly difficult thing to define, which is why we are taking some care to make sure that we get it right. As soon as we have a workable definition of the crime we will legislate"; so, as I say, we would like to explore with the Minister whether the Bill's definition is workable, which, presumably, he considers it to be. That is why we have tabled the amendments.

Basically, the Government definitions, as laid out in clause 1(2) and clause 4(2), say that, if a court reasonably believes that someone's actions constitute harassment or are causing fear of violence, then they are. As the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) said, it is not inconceivable—I know that this might be welcomed by Conservative Members and indeed by some Labour Members—that that could generate much additional work for lawyers.

As the Bill stands, theoretically, people engaging in innocent activities, of which a judge happens to disapprove, could be caught. They may include shouting at a referee from the terraces at a football match on more than one occasion. I hope that the Minister will reassure us about that.

It is some two and a half years since the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) first moved an amendment to the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 to seek to establish a criminal offence of stalking. As, I am sure, the Minister knows, that amendment had been drafted for her by the Police Federation, which had long called for such a criminal offence.

The definition that we are seeking to add to the Government's Bill is not exhaustive. It would strengthen the Bill. I admit I am not a lawyer but, whatever Conservative Members say, they have not yet answered whether they think that our Bill—essentially we are seeking to put the majority of my definition into the Government's Bill—is too wide or too narrow. Perhaps the Minister will deal with that again when he responds.

The purpose of amendments Nos. 12 and 18 is to give guidance to the courts. If judges are to apply this Bill, they will need clearer terms of reference than the Government have provided. Otherwise, we estimate a possible rash of costly and time-consuming appeals, which is presumably why the hon. and learned Member for Burton said that it would provide work for lawyers.

Other countries, such as the United States, Canada and Australia, have all introduced laws to combat stalking and we know that the Government have been considering those laws closely in their efforts to find the workable definition that the Home Secretary was after. We also considered the experience of those countries when drawing up our stalking Bill. The relevant law in those countries often gives greater guidance to the courts as to what might constitute stalking. Activities such as pursuing or following a person, unwarranted surveillance, lying in wait for someone, non-consensual communication and trespass all feature in the definitions used in those countries.

The Minister said in written answers to me that the Government did not feel the need to have such a list system. One of their reasons was that many of those activities were already offences in Britain. I should be grateful if the Minister would go through the activities that are specified in other countries' legislation and tell us precisely where they are offences in Britain.

We based amendments Nos. 12 and 18 on the definition employed in Queensland, Australia, and elements of the best practice of the US and Canada. It is virtually the same as the definition in the Stalking Bill and lays out the most common examples of stalking activity.

It is not our intention to detract in any way from the proposals in the Government's Bill. We merely seek to give greater guidance to the courts when they implement the Bill's provisions.

Mr. Maclean: It may not be the Opposition's intention to detract in any way from the Bill's provisions, but the unintended effect of their amendment is that it diminishes the protections in the Bill. It is not just a matter of my opinion. It is a matter of the technicalities of construction of statute law. The danger with the list system is that the court will have to construe the provision according to the items on the list. If a phrase such as "and any other activity" is inserted, the court, under the ejusdem generis rule, must construe those other activities narrowly, according to the general characteristics that have already been given in the long list that the hon. Lady provided.

There is another practical difficulty. I do not know how anyone present in the Chamber could face a victim in a couple of years. After the Bill has had its Third Reading and comes back from another place, we will all be making speeches and saying that we have now given victims protection and that never again will poor, innocent victims be subject to stalkers. In a couple of years we will find that some weirdo is stalking women and abusing some activity that has not been caught in the list. That is the danger.

The hon. Lady said that her list was not exhaustive. Of course it is not exhaustive, nor is it complete. I would be more relaxed about a list system if I thought that it could be complete. Unfortunately, we are dealing with people who have some very weird ideas, and there are potentially hundreds of such people, or thousands if the Bill does not deter them. They can get up to pretty weird activities. It is impossible to define all the stalking activities that people could get up to. That is why it is best to stick to the harassment definition and concentrate on the effect of the weird activity on the victim.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): The opening phrase of amendment No. 2 states:

"Without prejudice to the generality of subsection 2".

Surely that covers the Minister's objection. The Labour amendment simply expands on that point.

Mr. Maclean: For the umpteenth time: no, it does not. Adding a catch-all at the end does not achieve what it seems to achieve. Judges must interpret catch-alls at the end of lists in statute according to certain rules that the courts have developed for the way in which they go about interpretation. The ejusdem generis rule assumes that, if Parliament added a catch-all, Parliament intended it to be interpreted according to the other characteristics in the list. It is not a wide-ranging catch-all. The best catch-all is to stick to the word "harassment".

That is not just my opinion; it is the opinion that we got after consultation. The Government did not pluck out of thin air the idea of plain, bald harassment, without considering any other ideas or suggestions. That is the suggestion that we put in our consultation paper. Following that wide-ranging consultation, there was widespread support for the proposal to use the concept of harassment and to concentrate on the effect of the activity on the victim, making that the criminal offence, rather than trying to define a list of activities that Parliament thought bad at one particular time, knowing full well that stalkers and those who harass victims are, by their very nature, dashed clever at finding other weird activities.

I shall quote what my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said when he quoted a victim at the Suzy Lamplugh Trust conference. Those words should be burned on our brains before we come to a view on this part of the Bill. That victim—not a politician or a lawyer—said:

"If you have a list of activities which you ban, my stalker will simply sit down and work out another activity with which to torment me."

I do not want to stand in the House in two years or write letters to my constituents or those of other hon. Members, explaining how the law was inadequate because we went for a list and some weirdo got round the list and made life hell for another victim. We do not have to do that, because the proposals in the Bill represent the best way of tackling the problem.

8.15 pm

Let us not worry about what any one of a thousand activities might be. Let us worry about the effect on the victim. If the effect is to cause harassment to the victim, we can trigger the offence and the provisions in the Bill for civil remedy and criminal defences.

I could say more on the clause. I have not discussed some of the other amendments, which I do not think have been moved. I give way to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), then I shall conclude.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Minister realise that, as a result of fairly recent judgments, what Ministers say in the House can be taken into account by the courts? Will he go through the list in amendment No. 12 and tell us which activities he would expect not to be covered, so that it is on the record in the House that he thinks that proposed subsections (a) to (f) are covered by his definition?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands the ruling in Pepper v. Hart, which suggested that the comments of Ministers may be taken into account if there is ambiguity. However, when a Bill states that something is black, it is no good a Minister saying that it is white. The court will still interpret the word as "black". We cannot use our words, however nimbly we put them across, to change the meaning of the Bill, if the meaning is crystal clear; nor can I make any comment at the Dispatch Box that would influence the way in which judges use the long-established rules of interpretation to interpret a list.

The hon. Gentleman is trying to make bricks without straw. I understand his reasons. He has tabled all the Liberty amendments. It may be legitimate for him to take that position, but his amendments would pull the teeth of the Bill. There would be nothing left to give protection to victims. I do not go so far as to say that the amendment tabled by the official Opposition would fundamentally destroy the Bill, as the hon. Gentleman's amendments would—there would be no Bill left. The Opposition amendment would narrow the scope of this part of the Bill to a narrowly defined list.

Stalkers do not stick to the activities on a list. Stalkers and other weirdos who pursue women, cause racial harassment and annoy their neighbours have a wide range of activity which it is impossible to define. The result of our consultation exercise suggested overwhelmingly that the approach in the Bill is the best one. Therefore, I am not persuaded to fly in the face of the consultation exercise, the expert advice that we received and the views of victims of stalking, especially a victim who told us clearly:

"If you have a list of activities which you ban, my stalker will simply sit down and work out another activity with which to torment me."

For those reasons, and that one in particular, I cannot accept the amendment.

Mrs. Fyfe: I have lost of count of the Government Bills that I have seen which began with the preamble that, of a particular section, the following detailed provisions would apply. After his remarks to the Committee, will the Minister and his colleagues revise all the legislation that has been passed in the past umpteen years to remove such particulars? That is the logic of what he has said.

"without prejudice to the generality"

If the Minster's objective is to avoid rendering judges obtuse or stupid in their interpretation of the legislation, I suggest that amendment No. 12 would help. A judge would not be able to say that following someone, loitering near them, telephoning them and making flattering remarks, or sending them presents, was not harassment. Even the thickest of those on judicial benches would regard such behaviour as harassment.

Mr. Maclean: Looking down the list, I was immediately struck by its deficiency. For example—off the top of my head—it omits such activities as driving past a victim's house. That is not contained in the amendment, although loitering and watching are. What about the person who continually drives past someone's house, or harassment by direct speech, letters to the press, acts committed against a third party—such as the victim's spouse or children—or acts committed by a third party? Those examples are not covered. I have already provided half a dozen examples, and there may be others.

I do not consider myself to be a weirdo—although others may disagree—so I have not thought of all the weird permutations of behaviour that could be used to get round a list. However, if hon. Members have already found deficiencies in the list, within hours of reading the amendments, we can bet our bottom dollar that stalkers out there somewhere would change and refine their activities to get round it.

We should not be in any doubt that some activities, such as driving past a victim's house, is not caught by the amendment. Other activities may be caught, or they may not be. We should bear in mind that deterrence will be one of the best effects of the legislation. Police officers have said that their current difficulty is that they cannot tell a stalker, "Stop it, sonny, because you're breaking the law." Stalkers know that certain actions do not necessarily break the law. The Bill's provisions will enable police to advise many people that, if they persist with their conduct, they will be breaking the law.

"Harassment" catches a wide range of conduct and potentially allows such behaviour to be considered as breaking the law. A narrow list will enable police to tick off, reprimand and deter only those whose activities exactly match those on the list. It is not good enough to have grey areas or to say, "Driving past a victim's house may or may not be caught." A list system creates such ambiguity. Some conduct will be excluded directly, but other conduct will have an ambiguous status. That is my answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe).

Mr. Bennett: I am disappointed by the Minister's response, because I thought that the purpose of the Bill's Committee stage was to try to achieve constructive results. I understand the difficulty that an offence will be extremely difficult to prove if, as my amendments propose, we say "knowingly" and remove "ought to know" because of the issue of intent. Equally, it is a pretty good principle in law that, so far as possible, we should make it clear to people that they are in danger of breaking the law. Therefore, we should be trying to achieve clarity. I understand that difficulty, and I appreciate the way in which the Minister has made the point that, as soon as we make a list, there will be a problem with people who deliberately try to get round it. I accept that.

When I moved my amendment, I suggested to the Minister the development of a code of practice or regulations that would provide the necessary interpretation. I can also understand the difficulties with that approach, but I should have thought that he could at least provide the Committee with a firm list of such behaviour. As he said, a judge would not have to take specific notice of a list, but such a list would at least clearly express the Government's views.

In the course of proceedings on the Bill, I hope that Ministers will make it clear that they accept the list in amendment No. 12. If the Minister or his advisers can think of other examples of such behaviour, they should be included—so that people are at least provided with some clarification of the law on which to base their conduct.

I understand the Minister's argument that a police officer should be able to say, "Because of this general rule on harassment, that behaviour is covered." But, as the Minister has already pointed out, some of those people are extremely awkward, persistent and cussed, and they will not be deterred merely because a police officer says that a course of conduct is covered. They will be very tempted to pursue the matter through the courts. Such uncertainty will continue until there is a series of court judgments clarifying what is meant in the clause by "harassment" and what is meant by "reasonable".

I appeal to the Minister to look again for some way in which to provide general guidance stating that the conduct listed in amendment No. 12 and the conduct that he mentioned are clearly examples of harassment. The guidance should make it clear that, if one persists with such activities, they will be caught by the clause, and it should not close the door on including those activities. I should have thought that the Minister could come up with guidance that is sufficiently inventive to meet the need of clarifying the legislation, so that people are clear that certain activities will be treated as harassment and that others may also be so treated.

I do not want to press my amendment to a vote, but I should have thought that—tomorrow, during the Bill's Report stage—many Opposition Members will want to return to the subject. Therefore, I ask the Minister to think whether guidance can be given, without, as he suggested might happen, narrowing the definition of the offence. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw amendment No. 1.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Is amendment No. 12 to be moved formally?

Ms Janet Anderson: Dame Janet, may I reply to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett)?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Unfortunately, it is not possible to have further debate on that group of amendments as amendment No. 1 has been withdrawn. If the hon. Lady wishes to move amendment No. 12 formally, she may do so.

Ms Anderson: No.

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 30, in page 1, line 15, leave out from 'shows' to 'under' in line 17 and insert,

'that in the particular circumstances the pursuit of the course of conduct was reasonable—

(a) for the purpose of preventing and detecting crime, or'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 31, in page 1, line 19, leave out from 'enactment' to end of line 21.

No. 28, in page 1, line 21, at end insert 'or

(d) that it was pursued for the purpose of investigating a tort, suspected civil wrong or other matter, where a bona fide investigation is required in the interests of justice.'.

No. 6, in clause 4, clause 4, page 2, line 41, leave out from 'reasonable' to end of line 43.

Mrs. Maddock: Before the Minister replies to my speech and points out the flaws in my amendments, I should like to mention again the speed with which we had to draft them. I regret that, because of my speed in doing so, the amendments do not achieve what they were intended to do. They were intended to deal with the issue of "reasonableness", which has already been mentioned in the debate.

In clauses 1 and 4, immunity from prosecution is provided to people if they can demonstrate that they were acting for purposes of preventing or detecting crime—as all hon. Members would think sensible. Obviously, in many circumstances, tailing a suspected criminal is justified, and my intention was not to interfere with that provision. However, the Bill's wording caused me to be concerned about whether it would allow people acting to prevent or detect crime to harass other people to an unacceptable or unreasonable degree. The Bill seems to contain no such qualification.

That issue has already been mentioned by the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), who spoke about private detectives engaging in such behaviour. Another example which has already been mentioned in the debate is bailiffs, who may find that they are able to harass people on the basis of subsections (a) and (b). I hope that the Minister will reassure us on that matter. He has already briefly spoken about the issue of "reasonableness". The amendments' purpose was to probe that issue and to seek reassurances from the Government that people are not able to claim that they are carrying out some other, legitimate purpose when they are, in fact, harassing other people.

Mr. George: I shall speak to amendment No. 28, which is another probing amendment. I should like assurances from the Minister about the position of various people who conduct a range of legitimate investigations—they may be called private investigators, but other, more disparaging expressions, have also been used regularly. Their names do not always appear in the Yellow Pages as private investigators, but they frequently pursue investigations on behalf of the Crown—directly or indirectly—or on behalf of other organisations or individuals. I am not yet convinced—I hope to be convinced by the Minister—that sufficient thought has been given to provide the necessary defences for anyone pursuing a legitimate investigation.

8.30 pm

I tabled the amendment to allow the Minister to discuss with his civil servants the point that many private eyes undertake investigations with no criminal connotations. I mentioned earlier a list—I know that putting down a list is not conducive to gaining the Minister's support—of activities that are not directed to criminal investigations. The list includes investigating industrial accidents, matrimonial inquiries, the taking of statements, interviewing for witness statements, tracing missing persons and process serving.

I have looked at a text book on private investigation written by a gentleman named Ackroyd. On page 104 of his book, "The Investigator", he says, on the subject of process serving:

"To make what is termed a 'good service' it is only necessary to touch some part of the individual's body with the actual document."

I wonder whether touching an individual with a document, even though it may be a copy of a document provided by a court, might be considered harassment, resulting in the bailiff, the process server or the investigator being called to the attention of the police.

The list of activities that may not have criminal connotations also includes providing evidence for a local authority on anti-social neighbours, the vetting of potential and existing staff, and debt recovery. I hope to convince the Minister of the necessity of a stronger defence than that provided by the clause. The defence of an action in subsection (3)(a)—

"that it was pursued for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime"— might appear fine, but the argument of what is reasonable is problematic.

The Minister speaks with some knowledge on the private security industry, although his views may not always correspond to mine. He knows that some people might say that certain activities of the private security industry were reasonable and others might consider the same activities definitely unreasonable. Whether many of the manifold duties of a private investigator were reasonable may have to be tested in court. A judge's definition of what was reasonable might be a matter of considerable controversy. It would be easier—I shall not go into detail on this—for professional private investigators to argue their case if their profession was regulated and they conformed to standards laid down by law. Being a licensed investigator would provide a greater defence for certain activities.

Many, if not the majority, of the activities of private investigators are not related to criminal proceedings. The Bill is imprecise—indeed, confusing. Subsection (3)(c) might exempt investigators whose investigations were proved reasonable, but that is too vague and could lead to some legitimate investigators being subject to civil and perhaps even criminal action.

I do not believe that that was the objective of the Home Office in drawing up the legislation. The consultation paper issued in July said:

"There is a risk that if the scope of any new legislation to deal with stalking is not carefully defined"—

I do not think that it has been—

"it will criminalise the everyday behaviour of innocent people".

I do not want to argue about whether the definition is too wide or too narrow. I shall say only that when I was in the academic profession I often set the same examination question, asking students to consider a statement such as, "Legislation is more the function of the Executive than of the legislature." If I were pitched once again—against my will—into the profession that I willingly left, I might have to revise that statement to, "Legislation is as much the function of the judiciary as of the legislature." The broad definition bestows an enormous responsibility on the courts to do what we are unwilling or unable to do.

I have said that we need clarification on what is reasonable for private investigators. Obviously, investigators want to know whether it would be reasonable to pursue a party suspected of making a fraudulent personal injury insurance claim. They would want to know at the outset whether the suspicion was justified. The only way to establish the truth would be to keep the individual under surveillance.

In a second example, investigators might also justifiably want to know whether it would be considered reasonable to keep surveillance on an individual suspected by his employer of working for a third party or on a freelance basis. The investigator would not know the truth until the observations had been completed.

In a third example, investigators might also want to know whether it would be reasonable to keep observations on an estranged spouse who was claiming maintenance on the premise that she was not cohabiting with a third party or was not in gainful employment. The investigator would not know whether the maintenance claim was justified without establishing whether the estranged spouse was cohabiting or was employed.

A fourth problem is whether it would be considered reasonable to keep observations on a person to be able to serve that individual with some form of legal process such as a High Court writ or an injunction. Occasionally, it would be necessary to stake out a person's residence to effect service of legal documents when the subject was evasive.

Many other examples that occur daily in the lives of investigators have arisen from my consultations. Without the ability to keep people and their homes under surveillance, it will not be possible to establish the truth in a case.

Investigators frequently act in legal aid cases when the Legal Aid Board is seeking the recovery of money from litigants. Unless investigators have exemptions from the Bill, they will be unable to fulfil effectively the assignments given to them by the courts, inevitably inhibiting the ability of the Legal Aid Board to recover outstanding costs.

Virtually all surveillance activities by private investigators are of a covert nature. As long as the surveillance is legitimate, one hopes that the target does not know that it has taken place until it has been concluded and a report appears before them or the person who hired the investigator.

However, that cannot always happen. Sometimes the subject becomes aware of the surveillance. In such cases, the surveillance is discontinued or postponed until the target's fears have been allayed. It is important to clarify how the Bill will affect private investigators conducting legitimate investigations on behalf of their clients.

It is principally the legitimate investigator who has a problem with the measure, not the criminal element in the profession, which will not be deterred by new laws. I am assured that legitimate investigators are anxious to work within the law. However, if the Bill is passed without clarification of clause 1(3)(c) or adequate assurances from the Minister, it will be regarded as confusing and damaging by legitimate investigators who do a good job within the law.

Good, legal investigators, hon. Members and the overwhelming majority of public opinion support the principle of the Bill and applaud any measure that deters stalkers and protects the innocent from harassment. However, in the interests of justice, there must be some provision to protect legitimate investigators conducting bona fide inquiries from prosecution and civil action. I am not trying to destroy the Bill's intention and I hope that I can get assurances. In those circumstances, I would freely withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Bennett: My amendment No. 6 is in this group. As the Minister is keen to keep the Bill as general as possible to catch all forms of possible harassment, why cannot he keep the possible defence equally general under clause 4(3)(c)? It seems much better to have than to qualify it as he has done.

"the pursuit of his course of conduct was reasonable"

Mr. Maclean: Amendments Nos. 30 and 31 are unacceptable. They would prevent any activity that is not carried on reasonably for the prevention or detection of crime or under any enactment. Many activities, such as journalism, doorstep selling and political canvassing, may cause harassment but are legitimate if undertaken reasonably. We proposed in our consultation paper, which was published in the summer, that such activities should be protected, and the response was overwhelming agreement. The Bill recognises that and safeguards those activities by providing a defence for any activities that, in the particular circumstances, were reasonable. The amendments would do away with that safeguard and make illegal all sorts of legitimate activities, which would make the scope of the Bill far too wide. That is why we cannot accept the amendments.

8.45 pm

I listened closely to the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), and I have considered amendment No. 28 carefully. The civil law relates to disputes between two parties; there is no question of public policy being involved. When investigators are examining a matter of tort, it would be wrong to give either party to a dispute special privileges under the criminal law. The amendment does not wreck the Bill but it is unnecessary. If the action of a party to a dispute is reasonable, it will be covered by the general defence provided in clause 1(3)(c):

"that in the particular circumstances the pursuit of the course of conduct was reasonable."

That would apply to whole categories of people, such as journalists, politicians, doorstep sellers and people who canvass on religious matters. It would certainly cover, in the legitimate course of conduct, the activities of private investigators and security guards. It comes down to whether someone's activity is reasonable.

Furthermore, someone must claim that they have been harassed. Many of the activities of private investigators mentioned by the hon. Member for Walsall, South involved the person under investigation being unaware of the presence of the private investigator. That person could not fear alarm or distress; there is no harassment and no need for a defence. Only if a person under investigation became aware of being followed, or claimed that he was being stalked, and it happened a second time and the person tried to take action, would it be for a court to decide whether the activities of the private investigator were reasonable.

I cannot give precise examples—the hon. Gentleman quoted many—but it would always depend on the facts of the case: how the private investigator went about the activity that is challenged in court. As so many activities could be undertaken and challenged, I cannot give examples of whether one activity was reasonable and another not; it would depend on the actions of the person concerned and the effect that they had on the victim.

Clause 1(3)(c) is adequate for all those involved in legitimate crime prevention activity, such as private investigators or private security personnel; that would also apply to all other people. On Second Reading, we discussed whether it would be legitimate conduct for a Member of Parliament to badger an organisation to get an answer for a constituent. If constituents tried to solve problems, could they badger someone? Of course they could. If someone tried to claim that such a constituent's activity was unreasonable, it would be for a court, if it ever came to it, to decide whether the behaviour involved in an attempt to badger an organisation for an answer—or get something fixed, or goods delivered on time or services provided—was reasonable.

Amendment No. 6 would provide a general defence to the offence of pursuing a course of conduct that causes another to fear violence. The Bill already provides defences to that offence where the conduct of the person was: for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime; under any enactment or rule of law; or reasonable for the protection of himself or another or for the protection of his or another's property. The amendment would extend the defences to any circumstances in which the conduct was reasonable. That cannot be accepted.

The similar general defence of acting reasonably in the case of the lower-level offence of causing harassment has been provided in recognition of activities such as journalism and political proselytising, which may cause harassment but are legitimate and should be protected. That consideration does not apply to the higher-level offence of causing fear of violence. It is clearly not reasonable to put someone in fear of violence through doorstep selling or religious or political proselytising. We should keep that defence for exceptional circumstances, and those circumstances are clearly set out in the Bill. For the reasons that I have given, I hope that hon. Members will withdraw their amendments.

Mrs. Maddock: I accept from the way in which the Minister gently rejected my amendments, given the vigour with which he has rejected others, that he understood my points. I listened carefully to his remarks about what constitutes reasonable conduct. I hope that his reassurances are right. I suspect that questions about what is reasonable conduct will be raised again in another place. In view of his comments, and of the time, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Bennett: I have some doubt about the words "A person" at the very beginning of the clause. On Second Reading, the Government were keen to suggest that the Bill covered harassment not only by individuals but by groups. Opposition Members were especially concerned about racial harassment, in which a group of people could be either actively or passively involved. Can the Minister explain how the phrase "A person" covers activities, such as racial harassment or families warring with their neighbours, for which groups are responsible? Should not we perhaps use a phrase such as "a group of persons acting with common intent"?

Mr. Maclean: We believe that the wording is adequate to deal with those cases in which individuals may be harassing someone, perhaps for racial motives. It is best to leave the wording "A person", bearing in mind that the majority of the classic stalking problems that we are dealing with involve individuals. Even in neighbour disputes, with families involved, and in racial harassment, it should be possible to identify the one individual, or the various individuals in the group, who are causing the problems.

I do not know of any instances in which courts convict people in groups. Even if half a dozen people are engaged in a robbery, murder or other crime, they must be served with a summons, charged and sentenced individually; and often they get different sentences. In those circumstances, the language in the Bill is adequate to catch the bulk of individual, targeted, classic stalking activity, and should also catch those who may be involved in neighbour disruption or racial harassment.

Mr. Bennett: That answer is helpful, but does not fulfil the promise that was made on Second Reading. As I understand it, if a family is causing trouble to the next-door neighbours, it is not sufficient to serve the head of the household with an order; each individual has to be named.

Mr. Maclean: I can see no difficulty in that whatever. It would be justice, because if a family generally is causing trouble, one member of that family may not be involved. It would not be acceptable in British law—and certainly not in the European Court of Human Rights—to tarnish or convict a whole family, when individuals in it are innocent of the charge. If one did that, why stop at this law? To take the idea to extremes, why not convict whole families of murder, robbery or drug dealing when one member or a few members of it are involved?

Mr. Streeter: We could put that in the manifesto.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is tempting me into a commitment. If I had the prison places, I might consider it.

Seriously, though, what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting is not necessary; the provisions in the Bill catch the activity to which he refers. If we want to deal with half a dozen people in a family who are causing trouble, we have to get the individuals by name; we have to do that in any case to get any conviction under any rule of law of which I am aware.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

OFFENCE OF HARASSMENT

Mr. Bennett: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 24, leave out 'summary'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 3, in page 1, line 25, after 'conviction', insert 'on indictment'.

Mr. Bennett: I realise that the Government want to differentiate between clauses 1 and 2 and clauses 3 and 4, but would not the decision on what is harassment and what is reasonable be far better taken by a jury than merely by magistrates?

Mr. Kirkhope: I am somewhat puzzled by the amendments. The effect would be to require the person charged with the offence of harassment to be tried in the Crown court rather than the magistrates court. I am puzzled because the amendment does not propose any corresponding increase in penalty. The penalty set out in the Bill—a six-month sentence of imprisonment or a level 5 fine, or both—is the maximum penalty available for any offence tried in the magistrates court. It would be an unjustifiable waste of resources to deal in the Crown court with an offence that attracted those penalties. It would also create unnecessary delays.

The amendments also run contrary to the general thrust of the past 20 years or so to find ways of ensuring that cases which can be dealt with in the magistrates court are retained there. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to attack the excellent justice meted out by our magistrates courts. The pressure of time and the delays in the Crown court, as well as the much higher costs attendant on trials there, also militate against what he suggests. I can find no other reason for his suggesting the changes.

As the royal commission specifically recognised, if more business is retained in the magistrates court, more resources can be devoted to ensuring that the more serious cases going to the Crown court are better prepared and more quickly heard. It is in no one's interest to increase unnecessarily the number of cases sent for trial to the Crown court. In those circumstances, I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Bennett: If someone's reputation is at stake and rests on the question of what is harassment and what is reasonable, there is a much greater safeguard in being able to put a case for the defence to a jury rather than to magistrates, many of whom, perhaps as a result of their jobs, become somewhat case-hardened. However, I realise that the Committee wants to make progress, and on that basis I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Kirkhope: I beg to move amendment No. 42, in page 2, leave out lines 1 and 2 and insert—

'(3) In section 24(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (arrestable offences), after paragraph (m) there is inserted—

"(n) an offence under section 2 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (harassment).".'.

The amendment replaces the power of arrest provision in the Bill with somewhat stronger provisions which accrue to offences that are arrestable under the provisions of section 24 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

I am persuaded that the additional powers are needed for the police to deal effectively with stalkers. The power under section 18 of the 1984 Act for the police to search for evidence is particularly relevant and necessary if the menace of stalking is to be tackled effectively.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 2, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

CIVIL REMEDY

Mrs. Maddock: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 2, line 6, after 'claim', insert 'for an actual breach.'

The purpose of the amendment is to make explicit what we believe is the Government's intention anyway—that damages are not awardable where there has been only an apprehended breach but no actual breach of section 1. I seek reassurance from the Government.

Mr. Streeter: I am afraid that I am unable to give the hon. Lady the assurance she seeks, because, if the amendment were accepted, it might be thought that damages claims should be limited to cases in which harassment had actually occurred. On the face of it, it is not easy to see how it could be claimed that damages should be awarded for something that has not—or at least not yet—happened. Part of our problem is that we are trying to legislate for a wide range of behaviour. It is conceivable, for example, that even the anticipation of harassment could, in particularly vulnerable people, cause anxiety or loss. A situation may build up over a period of time and be about to reach boiling point.

The Government would prefer to leave it to the courts to decide in the individual case whether the award of damages was appropriate. The courts are very good at considering specific circumstances and tailoring the order to meet a particular set of facts. The courts' existing powers enable that to happen effectively. Before the court awards damages, it must first be persuaded that the victim has—under this legislation—suffered anxiety or loss. The court will not award damages unless it is persuaded on the evidence that that has happened. A defendant who feels that the court's judgment in that regard is wrong may, of course, appeal against the judgment.

Although the Government recognise the point that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) is trying to make in the amendment, we think that the courts' existing powers cover the point adequately and that the amendment is therefore unnecessary.

Mrs. Maddock: In view of the Minister's comments, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

9 pm

Mr. George Howarth: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 2, line 8, at end insert—

'(2A) In proceedings under this section a court may, if it appears just and appropriate to do so, order that the person who has been found to have pursued the course of conduct amounting to harassment, to attend a course of counselling with a named person or organisation for the purpose of persuading him not to harass the victim or any other person in the future.'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 15, in clause 5, page 3, line 21, at end insert—

'(2A) The order may, for the purpose of persuading the defendant not to pursue a course of conduct likely to cause harassment to the victim of the offence or any other person in the future, provide that the defendant attend a course of counselling with a named person or organisation.'.

No. 16, in clause 5, page 3, line 26, after 'defendant', insert

'fails to do anything which he has been ordered to do or'.

No. 24, in clause 8, clause 8, page 4, line 36, at end insert—

'(c) grant an order, if it appears just and appropriate to do so, requiring the defender to attend a course of counselling with a named person or organisation for the purpose of persuading him not to harass the pursuer or any other person in the future'.

No. 26, in clause 11, clause 11, page 6, line 41, at end insert—

'(6A) A non-harassment order may, for the purpose of persuading the defendant not to pursue a course of conduct likely to cause harassment to the victim of the offence or any other person in the future, provide that the offender attend a course of counselling with a named person or organisation'.

No. 19, in clause 14, clause 14, page 7, line 13, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsection (2A) below,'.

No. 20, in clause 14, page 7, line 15, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsection (2A) below,'.

No. 21, in clause 14, page 7, line 16, at end insert—

'(2A) The Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Lord Chancellor, may provide that section 3(2A) or section 5(2A) shall come into force in different areas of England and Wales in different ways.'.

Mr. Howarth: Amendment No. 13 and those associated with it cover the issue of counselling for those who are convicted of stalking or harassment in one form or another.

I should make it clear what the Opposition mean by counselling. We mean not some pleasant chat over a cup of tea between the perpetrator and some qualified counsellor, but the sort of counselling that forces offenders to face up to their offending behaviour, the effects that it has had and what its consequences can be. I will cite some examples of what I mean by that later.

The amendments are basically permissive; they give the courts the option to rule as part of an order or sentence that some form of counselling will take place. At present, the civil courts have no such power and the amendments provide a constructive remedy, especially in "sad cases" where a criminal conviction may be inappropriate.

The Government's definition of harassment, as set out in clause 1, says that what the defendant

"knows or ought to know amounts to harassment".

It is therefore clear that the defendant, even once convicted, may genuinely believe that his or her behaviour was quite reasonable.

Amazing though that may seem to reasonable people such as hon. Members, there are circumstances in which people simply do not realise that what they have done is wrong. That attitude is typical of those who commit offences that are directed toward another person—a good example being a rapist, who will cite the fact that the victim was "provocatively dressed" or that the victim said no, but really meant yes. Even more bizarre to many of us, but which happens, is the child abuser who argues that they were led on by the child.

All of us know, because we are reasonable and coherent people, that such statements are neither sufficient excuses nor reasonable explanations for such behaviour. The truth, with which the Prison Service has had to come to terms, is that people often delude themselves into believing that an incident was not their fault. The point of programmes which are already very successful in some prisons is that they remove any reason for people to continue with the self-delusion that they were in some way not responsible for the actions that they perpetrated. By introducing the concept of counselling into the Bill, we hope that those who have committed an offence will have to address the root causes of the problems that they have created by the nature of their behaviour. That, simply, is what we seek to do.

Of course, there will also be stalkers who are well aware of the impact of their behaviour on victims. They, too, should be forced to confront their offending behaviour. Merely placing restrictive orders on them may or may not be sufficient to remedy the problem.

[Mr. Howarth]

If the Minister can give me assurances that our concerns can be taken into account, and that remedies along the lines that I have described will be available, we may reconsider our position. None the less, at this stage I want to register the fact that we regard this matter as vital, and that I shall probably wish to press it to a Division.

There are many examples of stalkers convicted of offences such as breaches of the peace, or making nuisance telephone calls, who learn to restrict their behaviour and keep just within the law. That is a worrying phenomenon, and the Bill as presently constructed may allow such people to slip through the net.

The most effective way to stop harassment is to remove the root cause. A stalker who has been forced to address his own offending behaviour and no longer wishes to harass the victim is far less of a threat than one whose only motive in not committing further offences is the fear of legal retribution, important though that is. We owe it to the victims of harassment to ensure that stalkers are forced to confront their behaviour, and that an order imposed by the court can make them undertake such activity.

There are many examples. I shall not labour them, because all the cases have been mentioned in earlier debates, but they all help to make the case. Vanessa Kennedy, a resident of Lewisham, was subjected to an eight-year ordeal that she describes as psychological torture. She lives in fear of a man who has forced her to change her identity, has destroyed her family and driven her to move house. Vanessa Kennedy has attempted suicide four times, and claims that the perpetrator, Laurence Hammond, threatened to cut her into pieces and make her pay for rejecting him. He would describe in detail how he would torture her and other women, and the images still live in her nightmares. That man has never been forced to address the impact of his offending. Clearly, if the Bill allowed such things to continue without redress, it would not be adequate.

Secondly, I cite the case of Dennis Chambers, which has already been mentioned. The case came to trial earlier this year, and the defendant was acquitted when a jury was not convinced that he had caused "serious or really serious" psychological harm to Margaret Bent. The court was told that he had waited outside her home with a machete on two occasions, and had barricaded her into her office. Chambers admitted to the police that he had registered his car in Miss Bent's name and ensured that she received a string of parking tickets, followed by summonses and visits by bailiffs threatening to seize her property if fines went unpaid. He also admitted kicking her office door open, but denied that that amounted to affray. He said that it was "a mere act of instinctive criminal damage".

The drip, drip, drip effect of those incidents was not sufficient to achieve a criminal conviction, so there have been no consequences for that man. He has not been forced to face up to his offending behaviour.

The Government may say that proposals to force stalkers to confront their offending behaviour are uncosted and may prove expensive. However, the section of the explanatory and financial memorandum headed "Financial Effects of the Bill", says:

"It is anticipated that approximately 200 extra criminal cases a year will arise".

We do not propose that every one, even of that small number of people, would be compelled to have counselling, so very few cases would be involved.

Amendment No. 21 would provide for counselling to be piloted, so any cost implications could be closely monitored, and would be extremely limited in scope. Moreover, the purpose of counselling would be to prevent further offending, and could therefore reduce future legal costs.

Amendment No. 15 provides the criminal court with the power to order offenders to undergo counselling on conviction. Although magistrates courts can theoretically issue similar orders already, it does us no harm to reiterate the point. The clause also reflects the wording of amendment No. 13. There are examples of cases that highlight the benefit of making stalkers address their offending behaviour, such as the case of Anthony Burstow, who, in March 1996, was jailed for three years for inflicting psychological grievous bodily harm following a three-year hate campaign against a former colleague, Tracey Sant.

The harassment began when Miss Sant decided to end their friendship, but Mr. Burstow refused to accept that. His activities included sending her a soiled sanitary towel, stealing her underwear from a washing line, pouring solvent over her car and writing her sinister notes. This was the first case in which a stalker was convicted of grievous bodily harm, but it took five days of tortuous legal wrangling before the court was able to reach a decision.

A similar example is Perry Southall of east London, who was subjected to an eight-month campaign—involving more than 200 separate incidents—by convicted rapist Clarence Morris, until his conviction in September of this year. Morris was finally convicted of two assault charges after a case in which his barrister, David Stanton, said:

"Is it fair that a young lady who dresses to attract, the queen bee attracting the drones, the queen bee that dresses to kill . . . cries foul because somebody finds her attractive?"

I think that we would all take issue with that statement. In response to that case, the Home Secretary promised that the proposed Bill "would have the effect of providing proper safeguards against stalking."

It is difficult to envisage how those proper safeguards against further stalking can be provided without making some effort to prevent the root causes of the offence.

I will not detain the Committee with a description of the remaining amendments, which are consequential and follow the same line of argument. Although the Bill starts to provide some remedies, unless and until the unacceptable attitudes that people use to justify some appalling behaviour—mainly towards women—are confronted, and until the offenders are counselled and forced to confront their offending behaviour and the faults in their approach to other people, the root causes of some of the problems will not be adequately dealt with. This is an important issue and an important principle, and it is one that I hope the Committee will accept if it comes to a vote. We must make sure that the root causes of offensive behaviour are tackled properly by making provision within the Bill for counselling to take place on a statutory basis.

Mr. Streeter: I am afraid that the Government cannot accept the amendment. There is an element of confusion in the mind of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), although I recognise that he has tabled the amendment for the best possible motives. He is seeking to give a civil court the ability to grant an order for counselling, but all the examples that he provided would almost certainly be dealt with by the criminal courts when the Bill becomes an Act. The Bill has been introduced to deal with cases such as the Kennedy case, the Chambers case, the Burstow case and the Perry Southall case. They would be criminal cases, and the criminal courts have a full panoply of powers available to them to deal with the very points that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Amendments Nos. 13 and 24—which seek to empower the civil courts, when making an order under either clause 3 or clause 8, to order that a defendant receives counselling—are not acceptable for the following three clear reasons.

First, the purpose of the civil remedy is to enable a victim to obtain protection from harassment or anticipated harassment, not to provide a forum for determining appropriate treatment for the defendant. A civil court is not normally expected to make what amounts to a treatment order. Such an order is analogous to a punishment order and is not really appropriate for a civil court.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Minister not recognise that he is pushing the Bill that bit further to deal with neighbour disputes where harassment is involved? Surely there is a role for counselling when two neighbours are at war with each other and each is probably harassing the other? In such cases, can the Minister not see the advantages of the court being able to tell the parties involved to sit down and talk sensibly to someone who can persuade them that continuing that line of behaviour will not only be illegal, but damaging to themselves and to their neighbours?

9.15 pm

Mr. Streeter: The hon. Gentleman knows that a panoply of provision, including counselling, is already available in the multi-agency approach that tends to be taken in respect of such matters these days. Social services might well already be involved in disputes such as he describes, and therefore counselling would be available. Under the existing arrangements, if a court dealing with such a case was persuaded that an undertaking from a defendant to attend a course of counselling was sufficient protection for the victim, either in itself or in addition to other forms of protection, the court could consider that undertaking in deciding what order to make.

We must recognise that it would be a major departure to empower civil courts in the way that is suggested in the amendment. Even if we were minded to accept that civil courts should have the ability to make a treatment order, that order should not be limited to counselling, but should include the full range of provision currently available under the criminal jurisdiction. Singling out counselling, which is only one of a wide range of matters which might feature in a civil court's order, is unhelpful.

Amendment No. 15 and its Scottish equivalent, amendment No. 26, are also unnecessary. Whereas the previous amendments are intended to confer powers on civil courts to direct that a person receives counselling, these amendments would give such powers to criminal courts. However, that adds nothing to the powers of the courts—either under existing law or as provided in the Crime (Sentences) Bill—to order medical treatment that is likely to be effective in addressing offending behaviour. Courts already have extensive powers under the Mental Health Act 1984 and the Criminal Justice Acts to make hospital orders or to attach conditions of treatment, including therapy by a psychologist, to probation orders. Again, isolating counselling among the wide range of matters which might feature in a restraining order is unhelpful.

With regard to amendment No. 16, the purpose of a restraining order is to set out clearly those activities which are prohibited, and that is the extent to which we consider that restraining orders should go. In addition, to require a person to do certain things is out of keeping with an order which carries a strict liability offence, carrying a maximum penalty of five years imprisonment. I presume that amendment No. 16 is consequential on amendment No. 15 and that it is intended to ensure that a convicted stalker abides by the terms of any order requiring counselling to take place. As I have said, I consider amendment No. 15 to be misguided, and it follows that amendment No. 16 should fall with it.

Amendments Nos. 19 to 21 are consequential on amendments Nos. 13 and 15. I ask that Opposition Members should not press them, or the amendments to which I have just spoken.

Mr. George Howarth: I listened carefully to the Minister's remarks. In the conclusion to my opening speech, I said that we considered this to be an issue of principle. Through the availability of counselling, we seek to nip in the bud, in many instances, a sequence of events which might lead to a serious court case and possibly a prison sentence. We want to be able to move in swiftly and deal with the problem at an early stage so that it does not go too far.

The second part of our argument is that there is strong evidence that in cases such as those that we are discussing today people who somehow delude themselves into believing that their behaviour is acceptable and not beyond the bounds of reason should be forced to confront their offending behaviour.

The Committee needs to send out a powerful message which builds on the Bill's provisions. That message should be that, at the earliest possible stage, and on all subsequent occasions, offending behaviour will be confronted, and, if necessary, that that will be done on a statutory basis. I would feel more comfortable if that were a statutory provision in the Bill. I therefore urge my hon. Friends and others to join us in the Lobby to put it there.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Roger Knapman and
Mr. Bowen Wells.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Ms Janet Anderson: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 2, line 8, at end insert—

'(2B) In considering whether to order an injunction in proceedings under this section, a court shall have primary regard to whether such an order is necessary for the protection of what the court considers are the victim's legitimate interests.'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 29, in page 2, line 8, at end insert—

'(2A) Civil proceedings which include a claim under this section for an injunction shall not be referred to arbitration (whether under section 64 of the County Courts Act 1984, or otherwise) without the consent of all the parties to the action.'.

No. 4, in page 2, leave out lines 9 to 24.

No. 25, in clause 8, page 4, line 36, at end insert—

'(5B) In considering whether to order an interdict or interim interdict in proceedings under this section, a court shall have primary regard to whether such an order is necessary for the protection of what the court considers are the pursuer's legitimate interests'.

Ms Anderson: Amendment No. 14 would make the test for whether to issue an injunction under civil proceedings as favourable as realistically possible to the victim. It would make it more likely that county court judges would issue civil injunctions in strong prima facie cases of harassment. The Bill seeks to provide a remedy against behaviour that would often otherwise be considered lawful—for example, using the postal system, the public highway, or the telephone would be rendered a civil or criminal offence under the Bill by the effect on the victim. [Interruption.] At present, when deciding whether to issue injunctions, the courts are naturally inclined to attach too much weight to potential interference with a harasser's civil liberties. [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. I apologise for interrupting the hon. Lady. I ask those hon. Members who wish to take part in the Committee to listen to the proceedings, and those hon. Members who wish to talk about other matters to do so outside the Chamber.

Ms Anderson: The amendment would guide a court to consider primarily the victim's point of view during its deliberations. We believe that that is particularly appropriate under this legislation, because a typical injunction would involve only a small interference with the harasser's civil liberties but would serve to set a victim's mind at rest as well as protect the victim from potential future harassment.

The amendment would mean that, for example, when a person goes to court seeking an injunction and the court thinks that, on the balance of probability, the case is pretty 50:50 as to whether an order should be granted, the court should find in favour of the alleged victim and grant the injunction. The amendment's test of considering a victim's legitimate interest was approved by the Court of Appeal, which included the Master of the Rolls, in the judgment handed down in the Burris v. Azadani stalking case in July 1995. If the amendment were passed, we believe that the judgment in that case would provide excellent guidance for judges hearing similar applications for injunctions under the Act.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek your help. In view of the way in which the Bill is being proceeded with, there may not be an interval between the Committee and Report stages. I am slightly concerned that, following their recent defeat, the Government might decide to introduce an amendment on Report to reverse our decision this evening. Can you afford some facility to Ministers, who appear to be consulting busily with each other and with civil servants, so that they may give notice to the Committee if they intend to move on Report an amendment—which will probably have to be a manuscript amendment—that will affect our decision?

The Chairman: As far as I am concerned, I am dealing with the Committee stage at the moment. We have a little way to go yet.

Mr. Bennett: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek your assistance. It is difficult to table amendments on Report when we do not have a copy of the amended Bill. The order of the Bill will change, because Government and Opposition amendments have been carried. How do we table amendments on Report? Do we make them to the Bill before us or to the Bill as amended? I am sure that you appreciate that it is rare for amendments to be carried in Committee on the Floor of the House. We need some certainty, as the debate could end fairly suddenly and we would be on Report. We need to know how to proceed.

The Chairman: Committee stages on the Floor of the House are often interesting. As far as the Chair is concerned, when the time comes, the order will be intelligible to the House.

Mr. Bennett: My amendment No. 4 is in this group of amendments. It is difficult to bring the Committee back to considering the amendments, as it is fairly unprecedented for the Government to be defeated in this manner. The sooner a Minister comes to the Dispatch Box to tell us how we shall proceed, the better.

I turn to the construction of clause 3, which begins with a civil remedy and builds a criminal offence on to that civil remedy. It is fairly unusual in this country for legislation to muddle criminal and civil court procedures, and I think that there are good reasons for keeping the two separate. The civil courts must balance the differing and conflicting interests of the two parties to the case. They have to decide between the two parties on the question of fairness. That is often extremely difficult, because the difference between the measure of proof on one side and the other may be fairly slim. The alternative approach of the criminal courts is that someone must be found guilty beyond all reasonable doubt.

I am worried about the fact that the issue will first be dealt with by civil proceedings, and if someone is in breach of those proceedings, instead of ensuring that the matter is taken up by the courts as a contempt of court, we are creating a criminal offence. If we make a breach of an action in a civil court a criminal offence, we must make it clear that the same tests should be applied to the civil proceedings as would be applied in the criminal court. The standard of proof in the civil court should not be weaker than that applied in the criminal court.

I suggest that the Government think seriously about the way in which subsections (3), (4), (5) and (6) of clause 3 fit in with the civil remedy. I shall listen with interest to the Minister.

Mrs. Maddock: The amendment would ensure that civil proceedings on a claim for an injunction under the clause would not be referred to arbitration without the consent of all the parties. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that people can afford to deal with the situation in which they find themselves.

Most civil proceedings take place in the county court. A system of arbitration without lawyers' fees was created 20 years ago. As we all know, that system is the small claims court, and its original jurisdiction was claims of £100. That was subsequently increased to £500 and then to £1,000, and recently to £3,000. Claims under that limit, with some exceptions, are compulsorily referred to arbitration.

Until recently, it had been thought that the rules on exceptions meant that claims for injunctions would not be referred, but a court decision has now ruled otherwise. That is already causing problems in disrepair cases. A minor, but inadequate, alleviation to the rules has been made, so that it is a little easier for a case to come back from arbitration, and for a fixed sum of £270 for legal costs to be allowed in an injunction. That is well below the costs of preparing papers and appearing at a hearing—and, possibly, at a return date.

That has had a knock-on effect on legal aid. It may be that the lack of costs recovery in such a case would not prevent legal aid. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that practical access to the courts remains available, and I hope that the Government will look favourably on it.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): One of the problems of debating amendments in this atmosphere is that we end up with legislation with holes in it. That does not seem to matter to Opposition parties. The amendment that has just been passed undoubtedly weakens the Bill and seeks to drive a coach and horses through it.

The Chairman: Order. We have already discussed the previous amendment—I do not think that the hon. Member was present at the time. We are now on amendment No. 14, which he should be addressing.

Mr. Hughes: You are quite right, Sir Michael.

The Chairman: No, just Chairman or Mr. Morris.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): For 10 more days.

Mr. Hughes: That is disgraceful. You should call my hon. Friend to order, Mr. Morris. I was obviously dazzled by your bow tie.

I was making a point in parenthesis, and alluding to the fact that the Opposition are trying to soften the Bill. Here they go again—this is a good example of that. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) makes long, tough speeches about how Labour will be tough on law and order and will crack down on this and that. He says that, if only the Government would do something, we could get rid of this crime. Then we come to the Committee stage of the Bill, and what happens? The Opposition are concerned not about the victims of these crimes but about what they regard as civil rights. By that, they mean the civil rights of the people who are perpetrating these crimes. That runs through the four amendments that are grouped.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid–Staffordshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that at least one charge that cannot be made against the Labour party is that of inconsistency? Have not Labour Members been consistent in opposing all measures in which we have tried to crack down on crime, and, indeed, on terrorism? They either vote against such measures—

The Chairman: Order. The Bill has absolutely nothing to do with terrorism.

9.45 pm

Mr. Hughes: That was indeed a disgraceful intervention, but my hon. Friend is right. Bills that are currently being delayed in Committee—I shall not list them—could be rushed through the House if we could take the Labour party at its word.

Amendment No. 4 proposes that we leave out a whole lump of the Bill. Why are those exclusions in the Bill in the first place? I think that it comes down to something that we see time and again. In this place, it is easy to be critical of judges and magistrates and the arguments advanced by lawyers, and to say, "Surely they must have understood what we were trying to do; surely they understand what sort of criminals we are trying to catch. Why have they interpreted the law in that way?"

We all know that it is sometimes difficult to understand the exact intent of a Bill. That does not imply that Ministers do not mean to introduce clauses whose intent is clear, or that the lawyers—the parliamentary draftsmen—do not sweat blood to try to ensure that clauses are comprehensible and will have the desired effect. In the lines that the Labour party wants to leave out, exclusions have been made with the aim of clarifying the legislation, so that matters will be clear when a case comes to court—so that we know why and how people will be convicted, and there will be no let-out in the small print of the Bill.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) wants to leave out those lines, and, for all I know, he is supported by Opposition Front Benchers. If he is not, Opposition Front Benchers will no doubt explain why. The hon. Gentleman seeks to make a muddle of what is currently a very clear Bill.

Amendment No. 25 would insert in clause 8, at line 36, the words:

"In considering whether to order an interdict or interim interdict in proceedings under this section, a court shall have primary regard to whether such an order is necessary for the protection of what the court considers are the pursuer's legitimate interests".

We all see what those who tabled the amendment are trying to protect. We all know that people who could come into that category might well have a legitimate interest, although some of us would find it rather hard to believe that certain journalists have a legitimate interest, given the pursuing that they do.

Because of the form in which those who tabled the amendment are seeking to insert it in the Bill, however, it would have a wrecking effect—although, in procedural terms, it is not a wrecking amendment. I hope that the Committee will resist it, and that the Labour party will not seek to press it. Labour Members found themselves in a numerical majority earlier tonight, and no doubt they are now seeking to make hay with that; but seeking to add amendments such as this to the Bill, and to delete important parts of it, is highly irresponsible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I have been following my hon. Friend's interesting argument. Does he not accept that the Bill has widespread support, not only in the House but outside, and that hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber—indeed, members of all parties—seek to enact it as early as possible, establishing clear, firm law? Why does he think that the amendments were tabled? They certainly do not add to the strength or reason of the Bill.

Mr. Hughes: Characteristically, my hon. Friend makes his points clearly. He is a clear-spoken man. He knows what he wants, sets out to achieve those things and is much admired in the House of Commons for that.

Mr. Duncan: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I am confused by the drafting of the amendments, which is self-contradictory. Amendment No. 14 talks about "the protection of what the court considers are the victim's legitimate interests."

Amendment No. 25 talks about

"the protection of what the court considers are the pursuer's legitimate interests".

I fully understand that that may refer to someone pursuing something in a court of law, but it is highly ambiguous in the context of someone referring to stalking, as it is called, because the pursuer may be seen in the court as a person who is persistently harassing someone. Are we not therefore deliberately and wilfully drawing up ambiguous legislation that may be misinterpreted in a court of law?

The Chairman: In relation to my selection, the guiding factor is whether the amendments are sufficiently cognate to be discussed together, and they are.

Mr. Straw: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I wish to raise an important point of order for the whole Committee.

As you know, a few minutes ago, the Government were defeated on amendment No. 13, the effect of which is to require county courts to be able to order, where they so wish, counselling with a view to requiring the offenders to confront their offending behaviour. The aim is for the provision to be piloted by courts before coming fully into force throughout Britain. It is unusual, first, for the Government to be defeated by seven votes, as they have been, and, secondly, for progress without agreement to be made so swiftly on a Bill.

As we know, the Report stage will take place tomorrow. In view of that, Mr. Morris, do you agree that, before the 10 o'clock motion, we need a statement from Ministers explaining what their provisional attitude is to the amendment—after all, they have had many days to consider the amendment since it was tabled—and what their intentions are tomorrow when they come before the House? Do they intend to accept the amendment which, properly drafted, can be incorporated into the Bill or to try to remove it?

The Chairman: This is not a matter for the occupant of the Chair, but those on the Treasury Bench will have heard the hon. Gentleman and will seek to respond as they believe appropriate.

Mr. Straw: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. The Minister of State has now come into the Chamber. He is in charge of the Committee proceedings on the Bill. That part of the proceedings is due to finish at 10 o'clock. May we hear from him whether he intends to make a statement tonight, bearing it in mind that, for the convenience of the House, amendments for the Report stage will need to be tabled tonight or, at the latest, tomorrow morning? May I have your clarification on that as well?

The Chairman: Hon. Members will have heard my ruling, and it remains unchanged.

Mr. Bennett: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Is this another point of order?

Mr. Bennett: Yes, it is. It is on the proceedings of the House.

I understand that amendments for Report stage cannot be tabled until the Committee has reported. That means, therefore, that Members have to have, in manuscript form, the amendments that they would like to table, to hand in as soon as you move from one Chair to another. At that point, it is necessary for the House to have some idea of what is going to happen. I should have thought that it would be helpful, in making the selection, for the occupant of the Chair to have some idea of what is going to happen. It would appear to be difficult for the occupant of the Chair, in moving from one Chair to the other to start the Report stage, to make the selection, as it were, on the hoof. Would you give us some guidance on how we can make sensible progress on this issue?

The Chairman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for showing such concern for the Chair. I confirm that what he said on procedure is entirely correct, but I learned long ago to cross bridges when they are in front of me, not in anticipation of them.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. To those of us sitting here, it rather looks as though the Opposition do not want to carry on with the Bill. I do not know whether they are inviting you to do something to stop the proceedings, but if they are, the country ought to know that the Opposition are opposing an extremely important Bill.

The Chairman: I wish to make it absolutely clear that the Chair is here to serve the House until such hour as the House chooses to cease its debate.

Several hon. Members rose—

The Chairman: Order all round. I have given some helpful rulings, I think, and fair points of order have been raised. I would rather get on with the Bill, but if there are new dimensions to discuss, I will accept further points of order. They had better be new ones.

Mr. Fabricant: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have scanned the Bill and I can see no definition of the word "pursuer". Could you enlighten the House whether pursuer—

The Chairman: Order. That is nothing to do with the Chair.

Mr. Straw: I crave your indulgence, Mr. Morris, on one more occasion. Further to that point of order, and in response to the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence), may I make it clear that we have agreed, and we stick by the agreement, to co-operate with the Government in getting the Bill through? However, it is also for the Government to co-operate with the House in ensuring that the Bill gets through. The Committee has expressed its will this evening by 179 votes to 172 in respect of amendment No. 13. It is incumbent on Ministers on the Treasury Bench to facilitate progress on the Bill tomorrow.

Mr. Maclean: I have heard all the points of order. The Government will ensure that the Bill is dealt with as expeditiously as possible on the Floor of the House, but I will not be bounced by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) into making a pronouncement from the Dispatch Box now on the result of the vote that we just heard. I assure hon. Members that we shall make the Government's view plain to the House at the earliest opportunity, in accordance with the rules of the House and our customs and conventions, to give hon. Members the maximum time within our rules to consider the announcement that we shall make in due course.

The Chairman: Mr. Robert G. Hughes had the floor.

Mr. Hughes: Thank you, Mr. Morris. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), to whose intervention I was responding, had his points answered by the hon. Member for Blackburn. It is clear that this group of amendments, like others, is designed to delay the Bill or to weaken it. The message must go out clearly from the Committee that the Labour party, aided and abetted by the Liberals, wants to weaken the Bill and delay it for as long as possible. That is what they voted for tonight. They cannot escape from their actions.

Mr. George Howarth: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it in order for an hon. Member, who was not even present during the events that he is describing, to accuse the Opposition of trying to delay the Bill? My hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has made it clear that the Opposition remain willing to co-operate with the Government, as they have throughout, to bring the Bill on to the statute book. The Government's incompetence, not the Opposition, has got them into their present position.

Mr. Beith: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The views expressed from the Government Benches suggest that we might not continue to make progress on the Bill tonight. Will you confirm that, in order to do so, it will be necessary for the Government to move the 10 o'clock motion in two minutes? Will you be careful to ensure that, if a Whip moves the 10 o'clock motion, you notice him? Otherwise, we will not be able to make further progress.

The Chairman: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I will try to do my duty to the best of my ability. Not much gets by.

Mr. Hughes: Given the dual evidence of the amendments on the amendment paper and the outrageous protestations of Opposition Members, it is clear that they want to delay and weaken the Bill. I do not want to delay it any further, so I shall sit down.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Mr. Morris, I left the Chamber for a moment to go to have something to eat. When I returned, I found the place in complete disorder—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman clearly had a very good dinner.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I do, of course, apologise, Mr. Morris. I did not mean that this place—over which you preside—was in disorder, but that the Opposition's entire approach to the Bill was in disorder. My attention has been drawn to a list of amendments, which seems to be absolutely preposterous. On the basis that they are trying to improve the Bill, why on earth have the Opposition tabled an amendment to consider the victim's legitimate interests—

The Chairman: Order.

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

SELECT COMMITTEES

Ordered,

That Standing Order No. 121A (Committee on Standards and Privileges) be amended by inserting at the end of line 50 the words:

'(6A) The committee, or any sub-committee, shall have power to refer to unreported evidence of former Committees of Privileges or of former Select Committees on Members' Interests and to any documents circulated to any such committee.'.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Hillsborough Tragedy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton): It is with a very heavy heart that I speak in this Adjournment debate. I am grateful, however, that my hon. Friends and Conservative Members are in the Chamber. Families of the bereaved of Hillsborough have travelled down to London and are in the Strangers Gallery to provide their support during the debate. I particularly note that the Home Secretary has chosen to reply to this debate, because I think that he realises the significance and sensitivity of the issue.

On 15 April 1989, on a glorious spring afternoon, 96 people went to a football match never to return again to their families. They were men and women of all ages—from 10 to 67—and 28 of them were 18 years old or less. They came from all parts of the country, although mainly from Merseyside, and all of them had one thing in common—a love of football, particularly of Liverpool football club.

It would serve no useful purpose to repeat all the events of that day, or to attempt to rehearse the many legal arguments that have been made in the intervening seven and a half years, but it is important to establish, in general terms, what happened on that fateful day.

Although the Liverpool supporters outnumbered the opposing team's supporters, they were allocated tickets for the smaller Leppings lane end. The allocation was made on the direction of the police, to facilitate their plans for incoming traffic carrying rival supporters. Roadworks on the trans-Pennine route slowed down the traffic carrying Liverpool fans. As they approached the ground, it was noted that match day arrangements had been changed from those for a similar game in the previous season.

It has been pointed out that the standard practice at Sheffield and elsewhere was for police to channel supporters to the appropriate turnstiles by using crash barriers. Tragically, such action was not taken on that day, and it set in motion a train of events that led to the tragedy.

The crowd built up outside the turnstiles in such a way that the police officer in charge there, Superintendent Murray, was concerned that fans were in grave danger of being crushed. He sought, and was given, permission from the officer in overall charge, Chief Superintendent Duckenfield, to open gate C to alleviate the crush outside. That resolved the immediate crisis, but gave rise to a much greater danger because the natural path for the fans to follow, unless directed otherwise, was through the tunnel facing them. There were no stewards or police to funnel fans into comparatively empty pens. Pressure built up in pens 3 and 4 and in the tunnel. These were the killing fields for 96 innocent men, women and children.

In the immediate aftermath of the horror, there was a breakdown in official reaction to the tragedy, which unfolded live on television around the country. It was the fans who pleaded for the gates in the perimeter fence to be opened; it was the fans who requisitioned hoardings as makeshift stretchers; it was the fans who began mouth-to-mouth resuscitation. Individual police officers and first aiders did what they could, but there was paralysis at the top of the command.

As the Attorney-General observed in the House on 26 October 1994:

> "It was a painstaking and thorough inquiry. . . . The Taylor report placed the blame for the tragedy fairly and squarely on police handling of crowd control at the event."—[Official Report, 24 October 1994; Vol. 248, c. 981.]

Lord Justice Taylor noted in paragraphs 311 and 278 of his interim report that > "the real cause of the Hillsborough disaster was overcrowding" and that

> "the main reason for the disaster was the failure of police control."

There was an agreed understanding in the Taylor report and beyond on what happened and who, in general, was responsible, but the inquiry did not take place in a vacuum. As the tragedy unfolded, misinformation was being spread. We were told that fans had broken down gate C, that hordes of drunken fans charged the rear of the Leppings lane entrance, and that the Liverpool fans had been the authors of the terrible misfortune of the day. Those who uttered such charges and wrote such lies should still hang their heads in shame, given the eventual findings of the Taylor inquiry.

The low point must have been the infamous report of that terrible day in The Sun. Even by its Grub street standards it reached an abysmal low, but it was not alone. Newspaper after newspaper, tabloid and broadsheet, fed the line that fans were responsible for the deaths. The world is full of gullible people. Perhaps that is why, as late as 1993, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) was still peddling the line that it was all the fault of Liverpool fans. As late as 1995, Mr. Brian Clough continued to point the finger at the fans in his autobiography. There is no fool like an old fool, in politics or in football.

At the same time, a steady stream of wholly partial versions of events emanated from police sources, blaming the fans and fuelling a climate of cynical disregard for the facts, dwelling instead on the exoneration of those who some might argue were culpable for the events of that day.

We are here tonight because of a recent docudrama on Hillsborough which demythologised the Hillsborough tragedy and provided catharsis for the survivors and the families of the dead. It was plain to anyone who saw that harrowing account—I note that the Home Secretary has commented that it was a harrowing account—that there was a presumption by the authorities that drunken loutish behaviour was responsible for the deaths. That was illustrated by the tone and content of the police questioning in the docudrama. I do not accuse individual junior police officers of acting unprofessionally; they were following a line set out for them by senior officers and the press.

If showing that a wholly erroneous version of events had been portrayed by the press had been the only achievement of the docudrama, it would have been worth while, but it also raised the issue of the allegedly faulty video camera and the missing video tape. In my research, I noticed that, in questions to the Home Secretary in the House following his statement of 17 April 1989, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) urged that all film of the tragedy be made available to the proposed inquiry. He presciently said:

"Unless we move quickly, that footage may be lost and it contains evidence that may be of great value to the inquiry."—[Official Report, 17 April 1989; Vol. 151, c. 38.]

How right he was.

We now have the testimony of Mr. Roger Houldsworth—a video technician on duty at Hillsborough on that fateful day—who apparently contradicts the police version of the state of the video cameras. He had the same view as the police of the build-up of fans in the pens. His analysis of the impending disaster is as at odds with the view of the police.

Of course, the police take contradictory positions on Mr. Houldsworth's testimony. First, they say that there is no new evidence in it, yet it was not put before the inquiry or the inquest. Only the police version of the video evidence was put to the inquest jury. Apparently, the South Yorkshire police, the coroner, and the investigating force—the West Midlands police—have hitherto declined to co-operate in determining how much of Mr. Houldsworth's evidence was known and to whom. Nor has there been, as far as I am aware, any attempt to clarify how, and by whom, it was decided not to call him. Some would describe that as a conspiracy of silence.

However, the Yorkshire Post has ascribed to the police the view that Mr. Houldsworth has changed what he said at the time, which contradicts the "nothing new" argument. The police cannot have it both ways. Without doubt there are serious grounds either way for reviewing that vital evidence. That must be added to the other outstanding questions that have never yet been answered.

The South Yorkshire police, in particular, must still answer the following questions. Why was Chief Superintendent Duckenfield put in charge of a major semi-final only 21 days before the game, when he was relatively inexperienced at policing football matches? Why, unlike in 1988, were there no barriers or cordons to filter the crowd outside the Leppings lane end? As the danger unfolded, why was the kick-off not delayed? Why did police not recognise the build-up in pens 3 and 4 when television commentator John Motson and the video technician, Roger Houldsworth, clearly saw what was happening?

Why was the lethal tunnel not sealed off as it had been in 1988? Why did Chief Superintendent Duckenfield tell the Football Association that fans had forced gate C when he had ordered it to be opened? Why did it take until 3.30 pm to make an announcement on the public address system to inform or instruct fans or to seek medical personnel to help the dying and the injured? Given that 42 ambulances reached the ground, why did not more of them get on to the pitch to provide expert medical help? Why did only 14 of those who died get to hospital? Why was the city's major medical disaster plan never put into effect?

Those and many more questions need to be answered. The House cannot raise the dead, but I hope that we can raise the burden on the survivors and on the families of the victims, who wish only to see that justice is done. The dead, their families and survivors cry out in the name of natural justice to be answered. It is incumbent on us to seek a reopening of the inquiry into the events of that dreadful day.

10.12 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): I would like to join the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) in expressing my deepest sympathy to the families involved in the tragic event which took place at Hillsborough. I know that I speak for the whole House when I say that our thoughts will remain with them this Christmas, which I know that they must find a particularly difficult time of year.

Anybody who saw the news reports on that dreadful Saturday, 15 April 1989, will have been overwhelmed by the terrible, distressing pictures. I know that the loss of the families that suffered that appalling tragedy was made all the worse by the fact that it arose from an event that should have been a normal family outing.

I have watched the programme "Hillsborough" and I indeed found it harrowing, but the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that any decisions that I am called upon to make have to be made on the basis of a consideration of all the relevant facts, not simply on the basis of one television programme, however powerful and moving. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there have been four independent investigations and reviews of the Hillsborough tragedy: Lord Taylor's inquiry; the inquest into each of the deaths; the investigation into police behaviour supervised by the Police Complaints Authority; and the judicial review of the inquest. Each of those inquiries served a different purpose, and it might be helpful if I said a little about each of them and their outcomes.

First, the formal inquiry by Lord Taylor was commissioned by the then Home Secretary on the second day after the disaster. Its terms of reference were not only to inquire into the events but to make recommendations about crowd control and safety at sports events. Over 31 days, between 15 May and 29 June 1989, Lord Taylor heard oral evidence from 174 witnesses at a public hearing in Sheffield. He also received evidence in the form of submissions and letters. The inquiry considered video film from three separate sources, providing in all about 71 hours of further evidence.

Lord Taylor published an interim report in August 1989, setting out the causes of the disaster and making immediate recommendations. He found that there were a number of causes of that disaster. The immediate cause of the gross overcrowding was the failure to cut off access to the central pens, which were already over-full. They were already over-full because no safe maximum capacities had been laid down, because no attempt was made to control entry to individual pens numerically, and because there was no effective visual monitoring of crowd density.

Lord Taylor found that, when the influx from gate C entered pen 3, the layout of the barriers afforded less protection than it should have done, and the barrier collapsed. He found that the need to open gate C was due to dangerous congestion at the turnstiles. That congestion occurred because, as both the club and the police should have realised, the turnstile area could not easily cope with the large numbers unless they arrived steadily over a lengthy period. The police had failed to draw up plans on how to control large numbers should they arrive in a short period. Unfortunately, that event, which Lord Taylor considered to be foreseeable, was what took place.

Finally, Lord Taylor found that the presence of an unruly minority, who had drunk too much, aggravated the problem, as did the club's confused and inadequate signs and ticketing. There were a number of reasons for that dreadful disaster, and no single person or organisation was held to blame, but Lord Taylor did clearly put a significant portion of the blame at the door of the police. Indeed, he was particularly critical of the attitude of South Yorkshire police to the disaster.

Lord Taylor said:

"It is a matter of regret that at the hearing and in their submissions the South Yorkshire Police were not prepared to concede that they were in any respect at fault in what occurred. Mr. Duckenfield, under pressure of cross-examination, apologised for blaming the Liverpool fans for causing the deaths. But that apart, the police case was to blame the fans for being late and drunk and to blame the club for failing to monitor the pens. It was argued that the fatal crush was not caused by the influx through gate C but was due to barrier 124a being defective. Such an unrealistic approach gives cause for anxiety as to whether lessons have been learnt. It would have been more seemly and encouraging for the future if responsibility had been faced."

Lord Taylor also considered the reports that had been published in the press about the behaviour of Liverpool fans. Again I quote from his report:

"Before this Inquiry began there were stories reported in the press, and said to have emanated from police officers present at the match, of 'mass drunkenness'. It was said that drunken fans urinated on police whilst they were pulling the dead and injured out, that others had even urinated on the bodies of the dead and stolen their belongings. Not a single witness was called before the inquiry to support any of those allegations, although every opportunity was afforded for any of the represented parties to have any witness called whom they wished. As soon as the allegations I have mentioned were made in the press, Mr. Peter Wright, Chief Constable of South Yorkshire, made a dignified statement dissociating himself from such grave and emotive calumnies. Those who made them and those who disseminated them would have done better to hold their peace."

That is strong criticism. I think that those quotations demonstrate that many of the points made by the programme, "Hillsborough", were considered by Lord Taylor at the time.

I should stress that, since the report, the police have accepted responsibility for the part that they played in the disaster. The present chief constable of South Yorkshire, Richard Wells, has on several occasions publicly expressed his deep sorrow at the deaths. More recently, on the "Today" programme, he said that the police saw their responsibility in three particular areas. He admitted that, once the gates were open, the police should have foreseen where the fans would go; he accepted that they might have reduced some of the pressure by changing the kick-off time; and he also accepted that officers did not recognise soon enough the distinction between disorder and distress. The South Yorkshire police have accepted that they were at fault in those respects and the South Yorkshire police authority has paid compensation to the families of those who died.

The second investigation into events was an inquest conducted by Her Majesty's coroner for the western district of South Yorkshire. That was a difficult task, partly because of the number of deaths and partly because the Taylor inquiry was still in progress. The coroner conducted an inquiry into the deaths and sat for a total of 96 days. It is important that I remind the House of the purpose of an inquest.

An inquest is a fact-finding inquiry conducted to establish reliable answers to four important but limited factual questions. They are the identity of the deceased, the place of death, the time—if known—and the date of death, and how the deceased came by his or her death. That is all an inquest can consider. Rule 36 of the coroners' rules of 1984 requires that proceedings and evidence are directed solely at finding answers to those questions and forbids any expression of opinion on other matters.

The jury examining the evidence found that the cause of death was accidental death, but the findings of an inquest do not bind any person affected by them. The inquest's conclusion, indeed, must not be framed in such a way as to determine any question of criminal responsibility on the part of any named person or any question of civil liability. A finding of accidental death does not prevent further proceedings.

The third investigation into the disaster was conducted by West Midlands police, supervised by the independent Police Complaints Authority, with a view to establishing whether the tragedy resulted from, or was made worse by, criminal activity on the part of any individual. It also considered whether any officer should be subject to disciplinary proceedings.

The investigation involved the taking of 5,341 statements, as well as scrutiny of all the material that had previously been examined. The evidence was sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who concluded that the result did not indicate that anyone should be made the subject of criminal proceedings. That has meant that neither Chief Superintendent Duckenfield nor Superintendent Murray, who were both criticised by the Taylor inquiry—nor for that matter any other person—has been charged with any crime. For any other person apart from a police officer, that would have been the end of the proceedings, but for a police officer there remained the question of whether they had failed in their duty.

The Police Complaints Authority decided that Chief Superintendent Duckenfield and Superintendent Murray should face disciplinary charges. Police disciplinary hearings are held in private. They are concerned only with whether an officer may have failed to conform to police discipline; they do not consider wider issues.

In the event, Mr. Duckenfield retired due to ill health in advance of a disciplinary tribunal's ruling on whether he was guilty. It is sometimes forgotten that, although a number of punishments can be imposed for bad discipline, the most serious that a disciplinary tribunal can impose is that of dismissal or of a requirement to resign. In the event, Mr. Duckenfield stopped being a police officer and the disciplinary hearing could not continue, because such hearings can be held only on police officers.

The Police Complaints Authority announced subsequently that disciplinary proceedings against Superintendent Murray would be withdrawn. When explaining its decision, the authority stated that the retirement of the chief superintendent, Mr. Duckenfield, on medical grounds, meant that what in effect was a joint allegation of neglect of duty could not be fairly heard in the absence of the more senior officer. However, some time later, Superintendent Murray decided that he did not wish to remain as a police officer either.

It is of course well known that there was dissatisfaction with the verdict of the inquest. The law provides a remedy for that by way of judicial review. The fourth examination, therefore, was the judicial review of the coroner's proceedings.

Relatives of a number of the victims applied for judicial review. In those proceedings, the conduct of the South Yorkshire coroner's inquest was subjected to a close and detailed examination. In giving the judgment of the divisional court, Lord Justice McCowan ruled very clearly that none of the points raised justified the intervention of that court. In particular, the court found that the decision of the coroner to exclude evidence of what happened after 3.15 pm on that afternoon was not an unreasonable decision. It also made no criticism of the coroner's directions to the jury.

Clearly, it is not possible for me to know the truth of what happened on that terrible Saturday. What is important is that we should be satisfied that those dreadful events seven years ago have been fully investigated and examined. The hon. Member for Walton calls for a reopening of the public inquiry. I have had a number of letters making a similar request from those who were bereaved, and I have met at least two of them.

I have said that I will consider those representations. I must emphasise the fact that I would not take a decision to reopen the inquiry lightly: I must be convinced that it would be in the public interest to do so.

The charge has been made—it is one that I will consider carefully—that there has been a cover-up, an attempt to pervert the course of justice. I shall also consider whether there is any new evidence, and if so, whether that evidence is of such significance that had it been put before Lord Taylor or before the coroner, either the outcome of the Taylor inquiry or the verdict of the jury would have been different.

As I consider those questions, I shall be searching for the truth about what happened. It has been said that there was a video camera trained on the central enclosure, and that the Taylor inquiry was told that it was not working, although that was not the case. But I have been informed by the chief constable of South Yorkshire that both the videotape and a transcript of that tape were made available to the Taylor inquiry. Clearly, that is a matter that I will need to look into.

I fully sympathise with the families who feel that in some way they have not learnt the whole truth about the deaths of their loved ones. Certainly in an appalling tragedy such as Hillsborough it is perhaps inevitable, though deeply distressing for the families, that there will be confusion about some details.

I shall reach a decision on any further action to be taken as soon as I have been able to consider all those issues. I shall certainly take into account everything that the hon. Gentleman has said tonight. Whatever my decision, I shall always be deeply moved by the memory of that awful event at Hillsborough on 15 April 1989.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes past Ten o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

9.34 am

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Although you are concerned with the reputation of the House, you are obviously not responsible in any way, any more than your predecessors were, for pairing arrangements. Would you, however, consider it part of your duty to say that the way in which parties organise themselves, and make arrangements accordingly, reflects on the House's reputation?

It is now quite clear that the Government party cheated outright on Monday by pairing the same names with both the main Opposition party and the Liberal Democrat party, which is certainly unsatisfactory. It is deplorable that such cheating occurred. I hope that, since the Government are a minority Administration, they will behave somewhat differently in the new year.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must not attempt to put words into my mouth. As he and the entire House know, the arrangements that political parties come to in this House are not at all the business of the Speaker.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a further point of order, Madam Speaker. As you know, on this the last day before the Christmas recess, the Government sometimes make a statement. Have you had any indication, either through the usual business channels or whatever, that the Government will make a statement on pairing arrangements?

My point of order is a little different from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) since I do not believe in the pairing system. I regard it as organised truancy. Frankly, I am pleased that the rest of my colleagues have been relieved from the pairing nonsense. I hope that, from now on, to the day of this Tory Government's demise, there will be no pairing. When we get into power, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) becomes Prime Minister and puts up the pink curtains in No. 10 Downing street, I hope that there will be no pairing, and we will drive through our legislation—new and old Labour.

Madam Speaker: I wonder whether that was really a point of order or just an expression of opinion. I think that the hon. Gentleman asked whether a statement would be made. He will have to wait and see.

Adjournment (Christmas)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Conway.]

9.36 am

Mr. David Porter (Waveney): Before we go into the Christmas recess, I should like to raise some points about the economy and my constituency. Like many of our coastal communities and their rural hinterlands, Waveney's unemployment and some infrastructural obstacles remain stubbornly high. In Waveney, there is not the same relative prosperity, per capita income or inward investment that there is in most of East Anglia.

I have taken the view ever since I was elected that I should make a judgment on each issue before the House in the light of how my constituents will be affected. I am one of the happy minority of Members who represents the area where he was born and brought up. When I have decided not to support the Government—on Europe, fisheries, or health matters, for instance—I have done so with the best intentions of serving my constituents.

Many years ago, I first became convinced as a teenager of the Conservative philosophy of freedom of choice, free enterprise, freedom to spend more of one's own money and freedom from state control. Through my childhood I watched my parents working day and night to establish a small business in a shop over which we lived. I was in the sixth form during the 1964 general election campaign, when I saw two prominent Labour party Front Benchers, Fred Peart and George Brown, swan in and treat Lowestoft to a display of hypocrisy, contempt and arrogance that sickened me.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): They still won the election.

Mr. Porter: Indeed they did, but that was old Labour. Since then, it has repackaged its image. The Conservative party has repackaged its image too, to some extent—freedom of choice has become an opportunity for all. That same basic gut feeling about offering opportunity made it possible for me, from an ordinary background, to become a Conservative Member of Parliament and speak for Waveney, as I am doing quite unashamedly in this speech.

We live in a world in which we have to accept regulation and control, where freedom exists under the law, and where responsibilities run alongside freedom of choice. It is a fact of life that sometimes the market needs stimulating, realigning and fine-tuning in the public interest, just as privatised industries need regulators.

I say all that by way of preamble, because I wish to praise the Government for listening to some of the representations that I and others, of all parties and none, have made about the need to inject public money in a structured and targeted way into parts of my constituency.

We have missed out on assisted area status each time so far. Great Yarmouth, up the road, has it, and there is no doubt that that fact has the potential to suck many jobs out of Waveney and into Great Yarmouth. However, we have objective 5b status, and from that some money is beginning to flow into a variety of projects.

This week we have had not merely an injection but a transfusion of money and targeted support. The Kirkley regeneration initiative, Lowestoft, has been successful under round 3 of the single regeneration budget challenge fund. That is a seven-year scheme in an area rated as the second most deprived in Suffolk, which suffers from high unemployment and from social, environmental and crime problems. Incidentally, both Benjamin Britten and I were born there.

The scheme aims to support business and to introduce crime prevention measures, infrastructure improvements, health measures, drug and alcohol counselling, training for the unemployed, housing improvements and an expansion of tourism. The council failed last year with a bid for industry-led regeneration, and it has built on advice from the Government office for the eastern region—an excellent support body.

Over the full seven years, the scheme should receive £4.2 million in support from the challenge fund. That money, complemented by nearly £22 million of private sector funding and other public money, should create 100 jobs, support 75 business start-ups, fund 50,000 weeks of training, help 875 people obtain qualifications and 125 people obtain jobs, provide 10,000 sq m of new business and commercial floor space, and improve or build 400 homes.

Kirkley, which is in south Lowestoft, is an area of enormous potential, with the best beach in Britain. The news is good, by any standards. As required under the rules of the challenge, Waveney district council led the bid. What puzzles me is why the controlling Labour party on the council should be happy that the Government have accepted that deserving case, yet still threatens to do away with such competitive bidding. I do not understand why Labour wants to stop ensuring that public money goes where it will be well spent and is most needed. That is new Labour with its old roots showing.

In the rest of the county, Suffolk Prosper, another seven-year project, is to receive more than £750,000, yet still Labour would remove that targeted money and the competitive edge. Labour wants to stop keeping local authorities on their toes in that way.

We are also to receive almost £3.2 million for the final 1-km phase of the Lowestoft northern spine road, which will promote economic development and alleviate traffic problems, and which includes the provision of a major cycle track. In addition, under the local transport capital expenditure we shall receive £150,000 for a package to assist public transport, make pedestrian route improvements and encourage more cycling.

There are still major problems caused by the axing of the trunk roads programme before the A12 had been properly dualled from London to Great Yarmouth. The third crossing at Lowestoft is the one project that would best link all the other schemes and plans, all the hopes and aspirations of businesses and individuals. I have not given up on that, and I shall see my hon. Friend the Minister for Railways and Roads about it yet again next month.

We still need success under the challenge for help with funding for closed-circuit television cameras in Kirkley and south Lowestoft, as well as in central Lowestoft, to complete the major drive in which Waveney is fighting for Waveney. However, what we already have is significant, at a time when public resources are in such demand.

The Norfolk and Waveney training and enterprise council, the chamber of commerce and industry, and business link will all merge in April. The Lowestoft 2000 consortium of local business is marketing Lowestoft aggressively and effectively. Yes, things have been hard, but the horizon is bright, provided that we do not throw it all away.

The Futura project, and the "Caring for Education" initiative, both of which I have mentioned in the House recently, are new ideas—innovative exciting projects that will harness the best in local people, enterprise, and both public and private finance. Next year, East Anglia will have the east of England investment agency, which will serve Lowestoft and the other parts of my constituency, including the towns of Beccles, Bungay, Southwold and Halesworth. Truly the future is bright—the future is blue.

Of course it could be argued that all that money in grants, especially the European Union money, would not be necessary if the country were not paying a subscription to the EU. Our subscription could stay in the United Kingdom to fund the regeneration, the inward investment and the attraction of tourists, and to give business even lower taxes. But I shall not develop that argument now.

I shall finish on a truth that is a lesson for us all, including my right hon. and hon. Friends in government. A Government who respond positively to communities that are determined to succeed for themselves are an effective Government, a Government who truly extend opportunities for all.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Before the House rises for the recess, one or two matters should be raised. We all know that an election should have been held before now. The Government cling on desperately, hoping against hope that something will turn up to reverse the tide of public opinion that is flowing against them.

It would be far better for our democracy and for the political health of the country if the election had taken place in the autumn. Then the electorate would have decided accordingly. For a Government who have been in office for more than 17 years to hang on as a minority Administration is not in the interests of this country, and clearly we can expect the Government to remain determined to cling on until almost the last moment, to see whether they can stay in office.

Ministers seem to be adopting today's equivalent of the 17th-century monarch's divine right to rule. To them it seems almost an impertinence that there could be a different Government in this country. However, democracy depends on changes in Government and in the political parties that form Administrations; it does not mean one party being in power all the time. I believe that there is undoubtedly a wish for change in the country—we shall see whether I am right when the time comes—and that by clinging to office the Government are doing themselves no good.

If I may refer to the point of order that I raised earlier—without involving you in any way, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and taking full responsibility for my own words—I shall add that in my view an apology is required from Ministers for what occurred on Monday.

If that does not happen, I hope that the policy announced by the Opposition Chief Whip will come into operation in the new year, and pairing arrangements will come to an end. If the Government feel otherwise, it would be appropriate for the Leader of the House to make a statement on behalf of the Government Chief Whip before we rise for the recess today. That is the least that we expect from the Government.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Winnick: Not with any enthusiasm, but I suppose so, if the hon. Gentleman wishes.

Mr. Arnold: I am flattered indeed. Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether he was a Member of Parliament in the late 1970s, when the Labour Government that he supported were in a considerable minority? Would he care to justify what went on then and tell the House about the skulduggery in the Labour Whips Office, and thereby show an interesting modesty?

Mr. Winnick: One thing is certain: at all times we have acted with dignity. [Interruption.] I see that the Vice-Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household, the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway)—the Government Whip who is, rightly or wrongly, being held responsible for Monday's cheating—is having a laugh.

I remember one incident from the late 1970s that has not been and is not likely to be repeated. That was when the present Deputy Prime Minister, who was then a prominent figure on the Opposition Front Bench, picked up the Mace and started brandishing it. No wonder he acquired the nickname "Tarzan".

I was not present at the time—I was between parliamentary seats—but many of my hon. Friends were, and they witnessed that incident. So we do not require any lectures, least of all from the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), who will be extremely fortunate if he manages to hold on to his seat at the election. I imagine that he will be one of the casualties.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Deputy Prime Minister was not suspended when he did that, either.

Mr. Winnick: No, he was not—unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover, who has been suspended once or twice.

I want now to draw attention to what life will be like for many of our fellow citizens this Christmas. This should be a festive season and people should have the financial means to have a reasonably happy Christmas and new year but far too many people live in poverty or near-poverty. The proportion of people living in poverty has more than trebled since 1979, from one in 14 to one in four. The number of children living in poverty has soared from one in 10 to one in three. The number of people dependent on means-tested benefits has doubled, from one in 12 to one in six. On income, the bottom tenth of the population is 17 per cent. worse off in absolute terms, while the top tenth is almost two thirds better off. That has happened during the past 17 years.

Some might say that the figures were produced by the Labour party, but they are based on parliamentary replies from Government Departments. When the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, which is certainly non-party, published its report on income and wealth in February 1995, it concluded that the divide between rich and poor was deepening. It recommended a far-reaching programme to stop what it described as the damaging consequences of that divide.

It is unfortunate that so many of the things that we hoped had gone for ever, such as mass unemployment, poverty, large numbers of people on means-tested benefits, the many pensioners who live on the smallest possible income and who find it almost impossible—perhaps the word "almost" is unnecessary—to make ends meet from day to day, have come back to our country. That is why, on the eve of Christmas 1996, after nearly 18 years of Tory government, we should be deeply concerned about what has happened to our country.

I do not suggest that post-war Governments, including Conservative ones, had no social problems or that people did not live on small incomes. Things were far from perfect after the second world war, but we all hoped, in the 30 years or so after the war, that the worst sort of poverty and poverty-related illnesses had been removed from our country for good, that at least we had made that much progress since the 1920s and 1930s. We hoped that the social changes had not only been made but consolidated to form a permanent part of British society. It is an unfortunate curse that in 1996 so many of our fellow citizens, through no fault of their own, should live on incomes on which they cannot manage.

The statistics that I have cited show what sort of country Britain has again become. We have gone back to the past in ways that I and my hon. Friends hoped would never again return to our shores. The Opposition look forward to a change of Government and policy, to an honest Government that will be concerned with all our people, not one tiny section.

We can only conclude that this Christmas will be sad in many respects for the people that I have described who live on the barest possible income and who do not have anywhere near enough to live on. They include pensioners, many of whom served in the last war. They sometimes ask me, "Who won the war?", and we know exactly what they mean. Anyone who disputes that, disputes what is actually happening up and down the country. I only hope that we can change policies so that we can give hope to them that they will have enough to live on and will not have to live in circumstances that are disgraceful in an advanced industrial country such as Britain.

9.54 am

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): We should not adjourn for Christmas without carefully considering several concerns of importance to my constituents. I wish to raise four issues: first, the success of the Government's private finance initiative and the opportunities that it creates for north-west Kent finally to gain our new district general hospital at Darenth Park; secondly, a matter that concerns my Sikh constituents, the state of human rights in their homeland, the Punjab; thirdly, the Kent Thames-side bid for the British academy of sports; fourthly, the south Thames-side development route phase 4, which is vital for the developments at Ebbsfleet in my constituency and to the peace and well-being of the people of Northfleet.

My constituents, and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), rely on three ancient hospitals: Joyce Green, West Hill and Gravesend and

[Mr. Jacques Arnold]

North Kent. We have been in the queue for 25 years for a brand new district general hospital, which would cost some £100 million. Each time that our local NHS has built up the project, the powers that be—under Governments of both parties—have considered it, gone white at the size of the price tag, and asked us to revise the project and find whether we could do it in phases. If we did it in phases, we would be trapped on the highly unsuitable Joyce Green site, north of Dartford.

That was the old NHS system: queuing up for the annual dole of capital funding—a system to which the Labour party would like to return. That is why I welcome the fresh thinking that the Government have applied through the PFI. Surely out there in the market, there are consortia that would like to bid to provide new district general hospitals, with the magnificent construction work that they involve; to provide estate management and management of the buildings, catering, cleaning and maintenance—everything that is required. That would be provided at a cost to the NHS, which would provide the doctors, nurses, medical administration and all that goes into making the NHS something of which people are proud.

In north-west Kent, we had five bidders to build, manage and run our district general hospital. Earlier this year, the Pentlands Healthcare group became the front runner to provide the hospital. It has provided a magnificent hospital on paper, which my constituents are looking at. It is not only excellent for the current population; it has immense scope for expansion as the Thames gateway developments bring thousands more residents into north-west Kent.

The PFI is wonderful for large capital projects, but it is hideously complex. Imagine the contracts running over 25 years, the disposal of current land holdings and all that that involves. That complexity needs the attention of Ministers to ensure that projects come through. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends in the Department of Health, the Treasury and the Department of the Environment for their positive interest and hard work in ensuring that this project will take place.

The Darenth Park hospital offers a magnificent opportunity for my constituents, so, in the spirit of Christmas, I would like to thank my hon. Friends the Ministers for what they have done. I would also like to ask them to keep up the pressure in the new year so that we can see bulldozers on that site soon constructing our new district general hospital—a hospital that has been possible only because of the Conservatives' PFI policy.

I should like to raise the subject of human rights in Punjab, as the chairman of the Punjab human rights sub-committee of the all-party human rights group in the House and also because it is my duty to express the concerns of the Sikh community of Gravesend and Northfleet in my constituency. That community has its roots in the province of Punjab.

Hon. Members will recall that, until 1947, the House was responsible for the affairs of India. When we departed from India, the then Viceroy, Viscount Mountbatten of Burma, negotiated the settlement for withdrawal jointly with the successor authorities of Mr. Nehru and the Congress party. He did so in the clear knowledge that Nehru and the Congress party had given undertakings to the Sikh leaders, particularly those in the province of Punjab. Subsequent to those negotiations and independence, the Sikh community was betrayed over the assurances that it had been given. The sour atmosphere generated then led to the tensions and misery that finally led to the desecration of the golden temple at Amritsar.

The past few years have been highlighted by continuing incidents of police brutality in Punjab, which has been responded to by zealots, who range from those whose objective is civil rights in Punjab to those who have had enough and are calling for an independent state of Khalistan.

In common with all disputes of that kind, the victims are invariably ordinary people, in this case the villagers throughout the rural areas of the province of Punjab. In recent months there have been signs of improvement, but great concern is still being expressed about abductions and disappearances. I would like to draw the House's attention to two particular examples.

The first is that of Jaswant Singh Khalra, the general secretary of the human rights wing of the Akali Dal party, a Sikh political party. He has not been seen since September 1995, when he was abducted by the police. The police have since refused to reveal Mr. Khalra's whereabouts, and he has not been brought before a magistrate or charged with an offence. It is precisely that type of disappearance, of which there are many precedents in history, that causes so much concern. The second example is that of Mr. Harjit Singh, a 34-year-old, who, last year, was picked up by 10 plain-clothes policemen in Punjab. He was abducted and subsequently brutalised.

Those examples are just two from a wide variety of cases. I believe that the House should make it clear to the Indian authorities that we expect the Indian Government to comply with their obligations to protect human rights under the international covenant on civil and political rights. They should ensure that all allegations of torture, extra-judicial execution, custodial death, custodial rape and disappearance are fully investigated by an impartial and independent body. It is high time that India, which is deemed to be a country of the future, cleared up its own back yard and saw that human rights were protected.

My constituency is part of the Thames gateway. For many decades, north-west Kent has depended on heavy industry for its future. In the past 20 years, those heavy industries have mostly disappeared, although those connected with paper and cement still remain, but they rely on high technology and a highly skilled but far smaller work force than used to be the case. That is why we welcomed so much the enthusiasm with which my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister launched the Thames gateway scheme and the vision with which that has been carried forward by the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration. The aura of the projects that the Government are encouraging offers great hope for the future. Those opportunities are already being realised, which explains the rapid fall in unemployment in Gravesham in particular.

The decision taken some years ago by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister to re-route the channel tunnel rail link obviously raised considerable environmental concerns in north-west Kent, with which we are still struggling. It also brought one overwhelming benefit, however, with the Government's decision to locate the international station at Ebbsfleet in north-west Kent. That has provided immense opportunities for new development. In fact, it has been estimated that, in time, 30,000 new jobs will be created. Transport links will also improve to the extent that my constituents, who currently suffer a 50-minute commute to London, will be able to travel from the Ebbsfleet domestic station to the capital in just 19 minutes. The development also means that a series of new roads will be built in north-west Kent, not least to the new district general hospital.

Much needs to be done. That is why I should particularly like to draw attention to the bid from Kent Thames-Side Grouping for the British Academy of Sport to be located in north-west Kent. In the past few days, the Department of National Heritage and the Sports Council have shortlisted the many bids received to 12. The bid from the Kent Thames-Side is particularly fascinating because the academy might be located on the Swanscombe peninsula on the River Thames. It would be close to Ebbsfleet international station. We have thousands of acres that could be developed for sport and consortium of interested local authorities, companies and the like, which have put together the magnificent bid.

The north-west Kent location is close to London and it has a unique advantage because, were the academy to be based at Ebbsfleet, which borders my constituency, it would supplement magnificently the sporting facilities of the capital, and enhance its bid to stage the 2004 Olympics. I hope that my right hon. Friends will pay close attention to the bid from Kent Thames-Side, which would so enhance sporting opportunities for local people in my constituency as well as the bid from London to stage the 2004 Olympics.

Considerable concern has been expressed about the access routes in north-west Kent because of the construction of the high-speed rail link and the associated major civil engineering projects, which are due to start within the next few months as a result of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill, which recently passed through all its stages in the House.

The principal projects will be the tunnel underneath the River Thames from the Swanscombe peninsula on one side of Northfleet, and the construction of the Ebbsfleet international station on the other side of Northfleet. It does not take much imagination to envisage the heavy goods vehicles that will roll through the town between the two major construction sites, because currently there is no alternative to passing through the centre of the old town. For that reason, I and many of my constituents have campaigned for an effective Northfleet town bypass, known in the bureaucratic world as the south Thames-side development route, phase 4.

Many hon. Members know all about backing bids for town bypasses—there must be thousands of such projects throughout the country and dozens of them in Kent alone. What has made the difference to my Northfleet constituents is the channel tunnel rail link and the two major civil engineering projects to which I have referred. Without the bypass, the lives of my constituents will increasingly become a nightmare. It was for those reasons that the project was worked up, but I have to draw the House's attention to the crass incompetence of Kent county council in its handling of the project.

Almost two years ago, my constituents attended a public exhibition at St. Botolph's school, Northfleet, to see the details of the bypass project. The council's meandering slowness since then means that there are no signs that we shall have the bypass before construction starts on the two big civil engineering projects. In those two years, the council has meandered through designing the project; its department of highways has applied to the department of planning for permission to build the bypass; and it has considered how to accumulate the land and involved itself in a hideously complex and delayed process of land swaps between the Labour-controlled borough council and the Lib-Lab-controlled county council.

After two years, we find that the council has landed itself in such disputes over land that the whole matter has had to be referred to the Department of Transport for a public inquiry. I do not know how long that inquiry will take, and I hope that Ministers at the Department of Transport will do all they can to speed up that process, which has so far been handled with outrageous incompetence.

Nearly four years ago, I was distressed by Kent county council passing out of Conservative councillors' hands into the control of a coalition of Labour and Liberal Democrat councillors. My only consolation was that several of the leaders of Kent county council's Labour group sat for Gravesham county divisions. I thought that they would at least give our town priority and get the bypass project through. Not a bit of it. Two years ago, the Government made it plain that they would accept two new highway projects in Kent, so those clever county councillors put the bypass in third position on their list. One year ago, the Government said they would accept one new project in Kent, so the councillors put the bypass in second position. The result was that the project failed, two years in a row.

I was delighted when my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of Transport gave £1.5 million of special credit approval to get the project going. The Government clearly perceived the need for the bypass, and my constituents were grateful for the Government's interest in the matter. My constituents are now appalled that, because Kent county council has got itself into such a mess, that £1.5 million must be returned, unspent, to the Government. Given the time requirements of the inquiry, it is unlikely that any more money will be spent in the coming financial year. I hope that Ministers will examine this matter, highlight the incompetence of the Labour councillors who control Kent county council and exert pressure so that progress can be made.

I am most grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to raise these four, admittedly parochial, issues that are of great concern to my constituents.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. In the time available for the remainder of the debate, no fewer than 11 hon. Members are hoping to catch my eye. With a little co-operation, all of them might be successful.

10.13 am

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I value the time for this debate, so I hope that I shall be able to express my views succinctly.

You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I have been Members of this House long enough to know that one of the Government's habits is to wait until the House is nearing the recess and then provide—especially on the last day—a series of written answers containing a great deal of politically sensitive and difficult material. That is not a new trick, but is one that the current Government have played with total effrontery and, in the past few years, with an increasing lack of respect. I do not think that the Leader of the House is aware of the extent to which individual Ministries save up for the last day those matters that they do not know how to present and put them all on the Order Paper at the last minute. A classic example is the difficulties relating to the important issue of railway pensions.

I am an individual member of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, and I remember that, during the passage of the Railways Act 1993, there was a considerable altercation with the Government, who accepted that they could not deal with the existing pension fund by simply taking all the money into the Treasury and keeping it for their own purposes. The Government did not make it clear, however, that future pensioners of the railway industry would have to see large sums of money being taken out of the pension funds and used as sweeteners for private buyers of existing assets, yet that is happening on an increasing scale.

It is deplorable that those who contribute to a pension fund—either taxpayers or fund members—should suddenly discover that their moneys are to be used, not to enhance benefits for individual pensioners, but to improve the tax position of someone who is already buying assets that will be of considerable use in the future. When we examine carefully what has happened in respect of railway franchises, we see that some of them do not make sense—they are being lauded as of such advantage to taxpayer that the incoming companies will end up in a negative position: in other words, they will be paying the Government for the holding of the franchise.

I am a very trusting creature, but when I read that, my little brain thinks, "That's interesting—why should a commercial firm want to take over assets in that manner and be prepared to pay a considerable sum to the Government at the end of its period of tenure?" Then I read the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General of the National Audit Office on the award of the first three passenger rail franchises. We have not yet reached the stage at which we can use visual aids, which will come as a great relief to most hon. Members; but it is important that hon. Members should know that when I refer to the report, I am talking about figure 8 on page 33, which sets out the subsidy payable to British Rail in 1995-96 and to the franchise companies from 1996 onwards.

Figure 8 shows that there is an impressive fall in the amount of subsidy for the three franchises, so taxpayers should be delighted that they are, in theory, getting such good value for money. Then one suddenly realises that, if those same companies know that they are to be given access to large sums of pension fund money, which they can use as they want in terms of contribution holidays, the reality does not match the appearance on paper. Far from the companies being disadvantaged in any way by having to pay contributions to the Government, they will have access to large pension surpluses to which they did not contribute and for which they are not responsible, but which the companies can use to subsidise their businesses.

In my opinion, that is sharp practice, and I think that members of the pension funds will agree with me. If there are surpluses in a pension fund, as there are in the British Rail fund, those surpluses should be used to enhance the benefits of those who contributed to the fund and those who work in the industry. They should not be consistently used to subsidise private companies.

That is an extremely unhealthy and unacceptable practice, which the Government have kept very quiet about. They have not sought to draw it to the attention of people considering the effects of the Bill that became the Railways Act 1993 or of people who currently contribute to pension funds. If it is such an excellent process, why is that the case? Why have not the Government simply said, "One of the deals that we shall make in unloading what we regard as loss-making services on to the private sector is that we shall give large sweeteners—£500 million sweeteners at every level—so that the franchise companies do jolly well out of it, whatever happens"?

There are fears—which, sadly, I believe to be well founded—that some companies will take the money from the public service obligation, bank it or squirrel it away and, when the going gets rough, find it very easy to go bankrupt. The 1993 Act provides that, if that does happen and private companies go bankrupt, the taxpayer, who owned the original asset, who lost that asset to a private company and who is sweetening that private company's finances, must pay for replacement services. Whichever way one looks at it, the taxpayer is caught coming and going, and that is reprehensible.

I am afraid that several nasty little bombs are sitting upstairs in the Press Gallery, waiting for the Government. When access is given to information, nasty questions are always tucked away in the Press Gallery long before they are given to Members of Parliament, and we might have a nasty habit of raising those matters on the Floor of the House just before we rise. That will not happen, because we shall not have the information.

I nevertheless believe that the Leader of the House has a specific task for the recess—to say firmly to some Ministers that, irrespective of party involvement, it does them and the House of Commons no good if that practice becomes more widespread. It is not helpful when Ministers say in a text that they hand out to the press, "We are thinking of privatising the Coastguard," and then, when Members such as myself question that, the Government say, "We did not mean that. The Minister did not say that. It is one of the things that he is thinking about, but he did not say it even though it was in the text." When Ministers of the Crown send out press notices and texts, if they do not intend to do what they have said they will do, they should tell everyone why they have changed their minds.

The acquisition of people's surplus pension funds will not damage the employees of the old British Rail—who, luckily, were protected by the action of Members of Parliament who made public what was likely to happen—but future contributors under the privatised system will find their surplus pension funds used by their employers in a way that they are not aware of and would not support.

The House of Commons has a duty to examine more closely the behaviour of the present Government. Their stewardship is reprehensible, and I hope that we shall be able to alert the public to the appalling things that happen daily.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Before the House adjourns for the Christmas recess, I wish to raise three matters, but first I shall mention some pieces of good news.

It is splendid news that unemployment has fallen below 2 million—I understand that the precise figure is 1,938,000. Obviously, every person who wants to work and cannot find employment is a human tragedy, but the House will rejoice that unemployment has fallen below 2 million for the first time. I understand that there has also been an unexpected boost to retail sales and that the markets are reacting extremely well.

The second piece of good news is that the present Conservative Government introduced the national lottery. Increasingly, not enough credit is given to the Government for the amount of money given to various organisations in our constituencies. I am delighted, therefore, that yesterday I received a letter headed, "Third grant programme: Health, Disability and Care", telling me that the Basildon and District Crossroads organisation—a community-based respite service for carers of people suffering from short-term memory loss—will be given £118,477. That is magnificent. I know that all the local carers will be delighted.

The third piece of good news was the ten-minute rule Bill—the Abortion (Amendment) Bill—which I successfully introduced yesterday, to amend the Abortion Act 1967. I was delighted that it received an unopposed First Reading. I was slightly confused, however. An Opposition Member spoke for seven minutes against the Bill. There was a loud call of "Division" and I appointed Tellers but, for some reason, no Opposition Tellers were appointed.

I know that there is some difficulty between the Government and the Opposition at the moment, but I am confused. An Opposition Member spoke for seven minutes and any number of Members entered the Chamber to oppose the Bill. One would have thought that two Tellers could have been appointed from the people who opposed the Bill, but no doubt—

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): I got in a bit of trouble about that yesterday. The hon. Gentleman is constantly confused about such situations. The voice of the hon. Member opposing the ten-minute rule Bill motion is what matters. There does not necessarily have to be a Division.

Mr. Amess: That is an interesting explanation; obviously we will rearrange our business in the House in future. I believe that the general public would draw the conclusion—

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman, having made a slight clown of himself yesterday, should choose to keep bringing the matter up. As it suits him to do so, however, let me explain, because he obviously does not understand. Yesterday he announced a date on which he believes that his Bill will be considered. If there is a debate, the House will have no trouble in considering what he proposes and voting then. This is a serious matter, and if the Bill were anything other than an extraordinarily self-seeking bit of publicity, the hon. Gentleman would be aware of that and would behave sensibly.

Mr. Amess: I do not need lessons from the hon. Lady. To suggest that many well-intentioned people throughout the country who supported the Bill yesterday thought that it was a clown is deeply distasteful. The hon. Lady knows that it was gutlessness on the part of several individuals who did not want the recorded vote, and that is a disgrace.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Does my hon. Friend believe that the true explanation is as follows? Yesterday we were discussing one of the most important questions that could come before the House—not an issue to be taken lightly, as Opposition Members said earlier. It concerns the value, the sanctity, the dignity of human life, and I am ashamed that Opposition Members should speak as they have. Is it not a fact that the Opposition did not appoint Tellers, did not want to vote yesterday, because they were, rightly, ashamed of what they were doing?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the House that I was in the Chair on that occasion yesterday, and I ruled on the points of order then. Nothing has changed between then and now.

Mr. Amess: The first matter I want to raise is about a constituent in prison. No doubt we all have constituents in prison, and never before, in the years that I have been in the House, have I raised a specific matter concerning a constituent in prison. I have spent an enormous amount of time, however, on that constituent's circumstances; the wife visits my surgery every week, as does my constituent's brother, who is a constituent of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). I shall raise one or two points about that gentleman's circumstances.

Just this morning I received a letter from my constituent's brother in the following terms:

"Mr. X has been wrongly convicted by the use of fabricated evidence. This was 'observation logs' supposedly contemporaneously written by the police and since been shown to be provably false".

The complaints investigation bureau, he says, was granted a dispensation allowing it not to conduct further inquiries because of a 12-month time limitation statute—this despite the seriousness of the allegations, which were that the police had fabricated evidence and had lied on oath.

The point of most concern has been the refusal of the Post Office for more than a year now to answer the question whether a reward was paid following the rejection of my constituent's appeal. This matter greatly disturbs the family. I have tried to get an answer out of the Post Office; we are all busy people, but I have yet to receive a letter signed by the chairman. The last letter that I received stated:

"As Mr. X will no doubt have made you aware, he was arrested by armed police officers of the South East Regional Crime Squad and was prosecuted by the Crown Prosecution Service for his actions. The Post Office Security and Investigation Services were involved in the case to safeguard the interests of the Post Office and to assist if necessary with any specialist or commercially confidential information. Inquiries have been made at Sir Michael's request; however it transpires that the Post Office does not possess a transcript of the trial in this case. In the circumstances I am afraid that I cannot assist you with regard to any instructions that the trial judge may have had in relation to rewards."

As I have said, my constituents are greatly worried. I have a responsibility to my constituent who is in prison, and I intend to carry the case forward. If my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House can do anything to help me, I will greatly appreciate that.

Next I want to consider a trip that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) and I made to Brussels a few weeks ago to visit the Commissioner responsible for structural funds and the Fisheries Commissioner. We took with us a local fisherman and a local business person, and we had a very successful meeting. I had never met Commissioner Bonino before; contrary to what I expected, my meeting with her was a complete delight. We raised four points with her. She listened carefully to them all and responded positively.

By contrast, the behaviour of the local Labour Member of the European Parliament was quite extraordinary. He has had every opportunity to help local fishermen. When he learned from the newspapers of our trip, he wrote to us giving us "permission" to visit Brussels. It really is going a bit far to suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point and I needed this man's permission to visit Brussels. He also said that he would be happy to join us, but my hon. Friend and I were not happy to have the MEP along with us for our deliberations.

Commissioner Bonino told us that, during the two years this man has been a Member of the European Parliament, he has had every opportunity to meet her; she would be happy to meet him, she said, any time, any place—yet he has never chosen to arrange such a meeting. By asking to join my hon. Friend and me, he was clearly trying to get some free publicity. I leave the House to judge his actions.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said that she was disappointed with announcements by Ministers. I, on the other hand, received this morning a letter from the Minister responsible for our fisheries who has been to visit our part of Essex. He is trying to do everything he can to secure extra funding for dredging the Thames estuary and to help the cockles industry.

My last point relates to local government in Essex, where controversy reigns between the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties. Indeed, they have had a great falling out. I understand that my right hon. Friend may refer to the issue later this morning. A Liberal county councillor in Brentwood is so fed up with all the arguing that he has joined the Conservative party.

Yesterday my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) received a letter enclosing a Christmas card that one of his constituents had received from Basildon district council building control. That constituent has apparently only ever dealt with the council once—over a building application two years ago. The House will already know that Basildon district council has spent huge sums of money over the years on frivolous activities such as sending people Valentine cards. It would appear that the nonsense continues.

It has been widely reported that a well known former sporting personality who used to be active on the left wing of the Labour party has now joined the Liberal party. Last week the Liberal party organised a press conference to celebrate the fact. But the falling out between Labour and Liberal parties has meant that this new Liberal candidate has felt compelled to write to the local press. It is said, he argues, that in Basildon

"I failed to win an injunction to overturn the party's women-only shortlist. This is untrue. I did invoke an injunction on the Basildon Constituency Labour Party alleging irregularities in the formation of the new CLP. Delegates had not been re-elected in accordance with Labour Party rules, and therefore meetings of the general committee were invalid. The parties to these proceedings were able to reach a settlement of all matters which arose from party procedures adopted following boundary changes in Essex. No admission of liability was made. The matter has now become academic since the 1995 annual meeting of the branches and of the CLP to which new delegates have been appointed. Both sides recognise the futility of further litigating what is a moot point. Financial aspects of the proceedings have been settled to the satisfaction of the parties.

It was also claimed by Labour Party central office that I was still a fully paid up member of the party. This is also untrue. I left the Labour Party at the beginning of the year. However, this did not deter central office from expelling me from a party I did not belong to."

The Conservative party is often attacked for its internal difficulties, but our differences over Europe, honest and straightforward as they are, bear no relation to the local difficulties in Essex between the Labour and Liberal parties. It all goes to show what broad churches those parties in Essex are.

The Liberals in Essex have made a complete farce of local transport by sending buses down Hobleythick lane; traffic movements on the Marine estate and the local fire station have also been badly handled. It is no good for the Liberals immediately to have a knee-jerk reaction about a local controversy, to jump on the bandwagon and then go completely quiet when their initial reaction is found to be wanting. In Hobleythick lane, a number of residents protested, but now we find that a number of residents want the buses. Initially there were proposals to change traffic movements—

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is there any way in which you can protect the floor of the House of Commons from this trivia?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman may think it is trivia, but so far the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) has been in order.

Mr. Amess: None of these matters are trivial to my constituents.

On the subject of traffic movements on the Marine estate, the Liberal council first announced that they wanted to alter traffic movements. There was a huge protest, and now the Lib-Lab council have had to back-track on that.

The final fiasco has been over proposed changes to the local fire service. My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) attended what he thought was a public meeting last week at county hall, but he was not allowed to speak. Essex county council, which is controlled by the Liberals and the Labour party, has proposed many changes. After the local government settlement, we have a 4.6 per cent. increase in funding for the fire service, but the council wants to shift resources from the south of the county to the middle of the county. The council wishes to downgrade the fire station on Canvey island in my hon. Friend's constituency and it wants to close Leigh fire station for the first time in 100 years. I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) is concerned about that prospect.

I will visit Basildon fire station later this week and I am concerned about the fact that the foam tender from Basildon will be relocated to Corringham. It is bit of a cheek for local Liberal activists to say that Essex county council's proposals are terrible and that it is all the fault of the Government because of underfunding. That is not the case. The council has been given more money than it has ever been given before and the fire brigade committee is headed by a Liberal county councillor.

Dr. Spink: I wish to clarify one point. The Liberal group on Essex county council accept that the purpose of the proposals is not to save money or make cuts, but to redistribute existing resources. The move is not Government-driven and all the political parties accept that point.

Mr. Amess: I thank my hon. Friend for that clarification. If my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House does not have time to answer all my points this morning, perhaps he could get the various Departments to write to me.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members will recall that, a few moments ago, I drew the attention of the House to the fact that many hon. Members wished to take part in the debate, and I asked them to consider that. So far, in some cases, my request has been ignored. I hope for some co-operation from now on.

10.42 am

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I shall be as brief as I can, but in contrast to some of the other contributions, I wish to refer to a matter of great national concern—indeed, a multi-million pound scandal, which I hope the Government will address urgently during the recess. I refer to the over-30-months cattle cull and the lessons that I hope Ministers are now learning for the new accelerated slaughter scheme that the Minister announced on Monday.

In a question to the Minister on Monday, I put this point:

"paragraph 24 of the consultation paper suggests that the way in which the slaughter will be allocated to abattoirs will be similar to that under the 30-months scheme. Is he aware of the real concerns about the way in which a small number of abattoirs have profiteered and made a killing from the scheme? The new scheme must be put out to competitive tender."—[Official Report, 16 December 1996; Vol. 287, c. 636.]

The Minister replied to an earlier part of my question, but made no response whatever to that latter point. For that reason, I seek the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House in pressing Ministers to take a new look at the lessons of the over-30-months scheme.

Hon. Members will recall that the Minister announced the over-30-months scheme on 28 March. He took an arbitrary age with innumerable practical difficulties. The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee had recommended that the 30-months age limit should be used for the removal of specified bovine offals. The use of the limit for the whole carcase to be removed from the human food chain was a political decision and had no scientific basis.

An important article, entitled "How the Government turned the beef crisis into a £2.4bn gravy train", was published in the Daily Mail on December 5. It was written by Dr. Richard North who, as hon. Members will know, is an internationally recognised food safety analyst, to whom we are all grateful on this and many other issues. He wrote:

"The scheme has devastated farmers, and taxpayers have been major losers but, as will be revealed on a Channel 4 programme tonight, a new scandal has emerged.

A small group of businessmen who own some of Britain's largest slaughterhouses have literally been making a killing out of the scheme, amassing windfall profits estimated at more than £200 million.

To understand how such a situation came about, we must recall the events immediately after Health Secretary Stephen Dorrell announced to the House of Commons on March 20 the link between Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease (CJD) and BSE. He cited a recommendation from . . . SEAC that—since some cattle over 30 months old might possibly be harbouring BSE infectivity, although not in the meat—all such cattle should be boned out after killing, before their meat could be sold. This process would allow the removal of potentially infected parts.

Immediately Douglas Hogg banned the sale of meat from all cattle over 30 months old, until a deboning scheme could be arranged."

It is clear that that was to be a temporary scheme. However, just as Ministry officials were about to send out instructions to specifically licensed abattoirs, cutters and butchers, there was a change of heart.

Under pressure from the National Farmers Union, itself blackmailed by the burger giants and the supermarkets, the Minister buckled and the over-30-months scheme for the whole carcase became permanent, not temporary. Richard North's article continues:

"The overpayment scandal began when, faced with the massive problem of slaughtering millions of cattle, the Government bypassed the established practice of awarding contracts by tender. It gave 20 slaughterhouses—out of 470 in the UK—the rights to do most of the killing.

Although some independent slaughterhouses bid £20 per head, MAFF ignored them and awarded the favoured few a lucrative 'provisional' fee of £87 per head, plus the value of the hide, bringing the effective price to more than £100—a £100 million cash bonanza."

That was but the start of the scandal. Almost immediately, despite pressure from hon. Members on both sides of the House, instead of allocating the competitive tendering bids to those who had submitted them, the Government gave the cull contracts to only 21 plants, although 72 had been approved and some 200 were eligible.

In the debate that I led on 13 May on the continuing delay and confusion that arose from the cattle cull scheme, the Minister mentioned, in answer to questions,

"the 21 that are in it at the moment, but the larger number which I hope will come into it".—[Official Report, 13 May 1996; Vol. 277, c. 703.]

In other words, other abattoirs might become involved, but no others were added for many weeks.

On 21 May, as we all know, the Prime Minister declared the infamous and totally counter-productive beef war, but surreptitiously the same afternoon he issued a press statement removing the over-30-months scheme from the control of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and giving it to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

At the same time, the Federation of Fresh Meat Wholesalers issued a memorandum to its members that stated:

"Rumours and gossip verging on the scurrilous are widespread. If for short term reasons these are wound up to produce political pressure on Ministers, we are concerned that the option remains for them to take emergency powers, requisition a small number of plants and take total control of the cull themselves".

In other words, Ministers were not in control.

During that period, both the big abattoirs and the Ministers were blaming the renderers for what had gone wrong. However, it seems that the renderers were asking only for through-put seven days a week for which they could cater. The smaller abattoirs were never told about that—in fact, they were bidding blind. Many of them would have been eager to participate and could have filled the Monday, Friday and weekend gaps.

There appears to be a hidden agenda. During that time, the industry was being restructured by default: bigger units were given greater responsibilities and bigger and bigger profits. We should remember that earlier this year, before the BSE bombshell, the Meat and Livestock Commission—which was being pressurised by larger abattoirs—was aiming for the "broilerisation of beef", as it is called in the United States.

At the end of the beef war, on 24 June, the Prime Minister said:

"The targets that we have set are ambitious. It is now up to us in this country—the farming and ancillary industries and the Government—to ensure that we meet them. The point is that this timetable is essentially in our hands."—[Official Report, 24 June 1996; Vol. 280, c. 22.]

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food subsequently back-tracked on that unequivocal statement in the House, and have done so again this week.

The Prime Minister was confident because he said that the OTM cull would be completed by October, but that did not happen. The main reason for the failure to proceed with the so-called accelerated slaughter scheme was that the abattoirs could not cope with any more animals. An insufficient number of abattoirs were forced to try to conduct the cull. The idea was that the Minister would draw up a formal working document after Florence. However, we still have not seen it.

On 17 July, I took a small deputation comprising abattoir and incineration managers from the south-west to see the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. He assured us that the OTM cull delays and the backlog would be swiftly removed. Despite his explicit promise, that did not occur.

In August, the Government's auditor, Coopers and Lybrand, produced its second report—which remains unpublished. It said that the economic cost was £21 per beast and not the £87-plus being paid to abattoirs. It also pointed out that abattoirs could make a further £20 to £25 from the hides. Following a threatened strike by Northern Ireland abattoirs, Ministers caved in again and agreed to a £41 minimum payment and no backdating. It is outrageous that the Coopers and Lybrand report has not been published. At the very least, the Public Accounts Committee must see it urgently.

From 23 October, farmers faced a 10 per cent. cut in the amounts that they received. The reduction was initiated by United Kingdom Ministers in Brussels and was aggravated by a revaluation of the green pound thereafter.

On 21 November, there was the curious case of the missing corpses. I pointed out to the Minister that, although the cull was progressing, nobody could put a figure on the number of carcases that were being refrigerated. Despite more questions on Monday, we still do not know how many carcases are in refrigerated storage. The Minister has not dealt with that huge problem, which also has lessons for the accelerated slaughter scheme.

While the farmers were forced to take a cut, not so the big abattoirs. There was a renegotiation in November which, again, was not published. Richard North's article—which succinctly reports what happened—states:

"The only legal buyers, the slaughterhouses carrying out the disposals, were offering at times prices of £200 less than the official compensation rate. Millions flowed into their coffers by this route.

This exercise has evaporated now that the backlog has all but been cleared. But the slaughterhouses have not had to fall back on the profits of a mere £41 killing fee. Last month"— that is, November—

"they renegotiated their fee structure, bringing them up to £131 for some animals—backdated to August 26.

Thus, as the animals pour through the slaughterhouses of the favoured few, millions more are pouring into the owners' bank accounts.

The strangest thing about this whole episode, the most bizarre in the history of farming, is that it is continuing at all. Already it has cost the equivalent of a penny in the pound on income tax."

The cull could have been completed and the registration process introduced months ago. Why was it not done in July, August or September? Ministers now tell us that, from 1 April 1997, abattoirs will have to submit competitive tender bids, but only for the programme after that date. We hope that the new programme will be well under way by then.

The Channel 4 "Dispatches" programme entitled "Making a Killing", which was screened on 5 December, lifted the lid on the cull shambles and the scandal. Many hon. Members and I have tabled a motion demanding that the Public Accounts Committee urgently investigates what has occurred. If we do not know what is happening to taxpayers' money, there is a real danger that the European Union Court of Auditors will want to examine the finances. It could remove all the funding from Brussels that supports the programme.

For example, if the 15 per cent. from Brussels—which has not been paid yet—is removed, British taxpayers will have to pay about £300 million extra. Ministers provided no substantial answers on the Channel 4 programme. However, the Intervention Board said that it was confident that there was "no significant overpayment". What is "significant"?

There is a footnote to this sorry saga. Since he was charged with conducting the programme, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has not spoken in a debate on the subject in the House. He has not answered questions or made a statement about the matter in the House. Is he to mastermind the accelerated scheme that the Minister of Agriculture announced on Monday and is he answerable to the House for the huge sums of taxpayers' money that he is spending?

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Unemployment has fallen again by about 92,000. I have not seen that figure confirmed in writing but, if it is accurate, it means that unemployment has fallen from 2,030,000 to 1,938,000. We should celebrate that achievement throughout the country, because unemployment affects people dramatically.

While we are celebrating our excellent economic performance, we should contrast it with the performance on jobs and employment of countries in continental Europe, who are not performing as well as us. Perhaps that has something to do with their minimum wage, the social chapter, inflexible employment structures and non-wage labour costs, which are much higher than ours. We must resist placing such burdens on our industry, thereby making it less competitive and less flexible. We must not follow the policies that the Opposition parties advocate, which would destroy our competitiveness, our jobs and our economy.

Castle Point has shared in the good news. Unemployment peaked at about 4,600 during my time as the Member of Parliament and is now well below 2,500—a fall of more than 40 per cent. I cannot claim to have been instrumental in bringing about that decrease, but I can claim that the Government have been instrumental in setting economic conditions of low inflation, low interest rates, high inward investment and a highly competitive and flexible labour market and economy. That is why jobs have been created in Castle Point and why I am sure that the people of Castle Point will give their verdict at the next election on Opposition policies that would destroy and reverse the trend of falling unemployment in the constituency.

I come now to an equally serious matter. Mr. Geoff Lythgoe dedicated the last years of his life to building the business opportunities for the physically handicapped centre on Canvey island. He was a good man: he was community spirited and spent much of his time working for disadvantaged people. Sadly, he died in the middle of this year. I visited him in hospital just before he died, and he expressed his concern about the future of the centre. I helped Geoff's widow, Joan, to put in a bid to the national lottery. It was successful, and an award of £75,000 was made yesterday.

I am proud to have been associated with such a wonderful man, and proud of the Government's national lottery policy. That policy was opposed by 183 Opposition Members, who voted against the Second Reading of the National Lottery Bill. I am proud to have voted for that policy, which has created 100,000 jobs throughout the country and, I hope, will now create a few more on Canvey island in my constituency.

I want to focus on Canvey island, and to refer to the three issues that I raised on the front page of the Canvey Island Times before prior to the last election. I pressed for an independent sixth form on Canvey island. My Labour opponent fought vociferously against that initiative. The Liberal Democrat candidate was also against it. I have good news for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because year after year you have had to sit in that Chair and endure me batting on about a sixth form for Canvey island. You will not have to hear that again, because we won.

The Conservative Government awarded a sixth form to Canvey island last week. I am proud to have been associated with that battle. I am only sorry that the local Labour party so forcefully tried to prevent that facility being made available to the young people on Canvey island, and to the community of nearly 40,000 people. Labour has betrayed my constituents on Canvey island.

The second matter that I raised was the provision of an accident unit; I suppose that it could be called a cottage hospital for Canvey island. I pushed for that, and said on the front page of the Canvey Island Times that I was "Totally in favour of an accident unit for Canvey".

Neither Labour nor the Liberal Democrats mentioned this health provision for Canvey island, either in the front-page report or during the election campaign.

On 19 March, the health authority said:

"Following representations from Dr. Spink, we are investing in a package of services including an outpatient clinic and X-ray service in the former Council offices on Canvey."

I am proud to have been associated with the provision of that clinic. I shall speak in more detail about it in a moment.

The third matter that I raised in the front-page report in the Canvey Island Times before the last general election was the improvement in investment and rolling stock on the London, Tilbury and Southend line, which was then known as the misery line. It was unreliable, not punctual and a misery for my constituents. Investment of £180 million has been provided for resignalling and track improvements. Prism Rail, which took on the franchise, is to place a £150 million order for new rolling stock.

Two weeks ago, I had a photograph taken with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport on one of the cascaded 10-year-old trains, which are replacing the 35-year-old trains. He has brought forward the policy of privatisation, which has enabled this investment. Furthermore, £14 million will be spent on stations, such as Benfleet station, to improve access for disabled people and to improve information and security. If people feel safer on the trains, they will be encouraged to use them. Those investments are to be welcomed.

It is a little surprising that Labour councillors—who fought tooth and nail against the privatisation that has led to those investments—should now try to associate themselves with the health clinic on Canvey island and with the investments by the privatised railway.

The health clinic on Canvey island will open in January next year. It will provide facilities for gynaecology; neurology; general surgery; orthopaedics; rheumatology; dermatology; urology; diabetes; blood tests; X-ray; ear, nose and throat; and midwifery. Facilities for ophthalmology and oncology, which deals with cancer, will be provided later in the year. My constituents deserve those facilities, and they have been provided entirely by Government money.

I am proud to have delivered on those three election promises for Canvey island. If I am determined and outspoken when I am fighting for Canvey island, so be it: that is why the people of Canvey island voted for me, and why they will vote for me again.

The cottage hospital is provided by the Southend-on-Sea hospital trust and the district health authority from Government money. My right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), my hon.

[Dr. Robert Spink]

Friends the Members for Basildon (Mr. Amess), for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) and I pressed the Minister for that extra money. We make no apologies for fighting hard for it.

I shall now refer to some matters that have not gone quite so well for Canvey island. The exit road from Canvey island is high on my list of priorities. It was high on the county council's list of priorities until the county council was taken over by Labour and Liberal Democrat councillors. They control the council and have now put the exit road from Canvey island down the list of priorities.

The exit road is not needed just for convenience and to alleviate congestion; it is required for safety, because Canvey island is a special case. The Labour borough council has approved developers' plans. It should not have done that: it is proving to be the developers' friend, which is very sad. I fought against the de Savary land application that went to appeal and which the Secretary of State called in. The inspector found in favour of the applicant, but I fought on and went to the Secretary of State, who eventually supported me and turned down the application.

It is sad that Labour councillors are not prepared to back me and enable me to fight to prevent the new development proposals. They are proving themselves the developers' friends by approving the development against the wishes of the people. Such developments destroy our environment and communities. They overdevelop our communities and put too much burden on our infrastructure—schools, libraries and sewage works. Moreover, many jobs will be destroyed if an inappropriate, major, out-of-town shopping unit is built.

I come now to the fire station, which my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon has already mentioned. I shall cover this important matter in some detail.

Mr. Flynn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have asked hon. Members to be brief. The hon. Gentleman has been speaking for 11 minutes and now says that he is going into greater detail. He will prevent several Opposition Members from making a speech. That is selfish and an abuse.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I had hoped that my intervention would enable all hon. Members to speak if they so wished. I have no control over the length of hon. Members' speeches; they are responsible for that.

Dr. Spink: I hear what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall move on apace. I hope to take less time than the average taken by hon. Members this morning.

Councillors are seeking to close the full-time station on Canvey island, which would leave only a retained station with no full-time cover. It would be manned by part-time firefighters, who, in an emergency, would be called out to the fire station from their homes and work if they were available. Councillors state that this is not a cost-cutting measure, but is purely an attempt to ensure that fire resources across the county are most effectively deployed.

The Home Office has confirmed to me that to close the station or to convert a full-time station into a retained station would require section 19 approval. I have already contacted Lady Blatch, and I shall be doing all that I can to put the case for keeping Canvey island fire station as a full-time station. It should not be closed.

Councillors say that they arrived at their recommendation following assessment of the standards relating to risk, response times, distances and the number of call-outs for engines. Those are interesting statistics, but it would be breathtakingly naive to fail to take account of the special circumstances that exist on Canvey island. In regard to risk, councillors now claim that people on Canvey island are not concerned about flooding; yet, according to a recent constituency-wide survey published in the "Westminster Report", people said that flood defence was one of the two top local issues, equalled only by the reduction in council tax. I can only conclude that the statistic has been misrepresented, because people on Canvey island are concerned about flooding—as anyone would be who lived there in 1953, when 58 people were drowned.

There are many special circumstances on Canvey island. It is a relatively isolated community, with a population approaching 40,000. During peak traffic times, when fires often occur, it is blocked off. That can happen at any time of day when there is a road accident: it has happened twice in recent times. Moreover, houses are tightly packed, and will be even more tightly packed following Labour councillors' recent decision to cram more houses in. That poses the risk that fires will spread and become major catastrophes. Furthermore, in comparison with the middle and the north of Essex, Canvey island is socially deprived, and the fire risk is much higher in areas of relative deprivation.

If councillors also close Leigh fire station—it is east of Hadleigh, while Canvey island is west of it—they will pull the fire engines from Hadleigh station in two different directions. That will affect the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon as well as mine, which is why he is fighting so fiercely to keep Leigh station open. The chief fire officer has admitted to me that the county council's recommendations would result in an increased call-out time, and therefore in a higher risk to life and limb on Canvey island. I do not wish to scaremonger, but that is a simple fact.

I am appalled that councillors are considering cutting our fire stations, when the Government have given them an extra £1,548,000 this year. That is an increase of 4.6 per cent., double the rate of inflation. There is no reason for the councillors to cut fire services; they should be improving them. South Essex is the centre of our wealth generating community in Essex—it is the centre of population—but, yet again, councillors at county hall in Chelmsford are deciding to move resources and facilities from the south of Essex to the centre and the north. They did the same with education and road projects throughout the last decade. I will fight to keep our full-time station open, and I am sure that the public are behind me.

Councillors cut funds for the flood warning systems on Canvey island by £4,000 last year. They also tried to get rid of 41 firemen, but, along with colleagues, I fought that successfully.

In recent times, Canvey island has done exceedingly well in some respects. There is the clinic, investment in the railways, the creation of jobs and the new sixth form—all developments that were entirely the Government's responsibility, and under their control.

Where the Labour-controlled borough council and the Labour and Liberal-controlled county council have had responsibility—fire services, flood warning systems and the exit road are examples—Canvey island has done exceedingly badly. Councillors should hang their heads in shame; and I know that they greatly fear the next local elections.

10.14 am

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I want to raise two issues. The first relates to London hospitals and health care services.

This is the beginning of winter. We never know what kind of weather we shall have in London or, indeed, elsewhere in the country, but we do know that, over the years, London has suffered from cuts in the national health service. Hospitals and wards have closed, and we have lost a great many beds.

My constituency contains St. George's hospital, Tooting. It is an excellent hospital, staffed by dedicated people, but they, along with staff in all the other London hospitals, are being put under increasing pressure to provide services. Last winter, we suffered on-going problems throughout the hospital, but especially in the accident and emergency department, where patients waited on trolleys for beds for hours on end.

Yesterday, the Evening Standard—which, to its credit, has played a major role in highlighting health care problems in London—published, on its front page, the headline "Emergency Wards Chaos", and, below that, the headline "Consultant quits in protest as crisis hits London hospitals". The report referred to my local health authority, the Merton, Sutton and Wandsworth authority, which covers St. George's hospital. Chief consultant Dr. John Thurston was quoted as saying:

"This is the beginning of our winter rush. Last winter was the worst ever with a major crisis in south-west London and we are expecting to see the same thing happen this winter.

Really, they should be expanding services rather than trying to run them down. It worries me and I don't want to be part of it."

Dr. Thurston has now resigned from his position as chief consultant to work in another hospital outside the area.

Dr. Thurston went on to say:

"It seems extraordinary to me that just as we are coming up to winter, they are cutting down on services."

Referring to an adjoining hospital that faces enormous problems, he said:

"Kingston cannot cope . . . They are inundated with work, as we are."

Geoff Martin, of the watchdog service, London Health Emergency, said:

"We are scared because there aren't enough casualty departments in London now, and we are getting patients stacking up on trolleys in corridors."

It is now December. May I ask the Leader of the House what action the Government will take now—not in the coming months of 1997—to ensure that accident and emergency services, not only in my health authority but throughout London, can meet the needs of Londoners? The right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Secretary of State for Social Security, and he knows how vital the issue is to London. I ask him to convey to the present Secretary of State for Health the deep concern that I feel about my health authority. I am sure that my comments could be echoed by many other hon. Members representing London constituencies, irrespective of party.

The other issue that I wish to raise is connected with the fact that, this week, the Foreign Secretary made the first visit to Cyprus by such a senior Foreign Office Minister for more than 30 years. As chair of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Cyprus group in the House, I welcome that visit. It was much heralded by pre-visit statements and, I understand, by an interview broadcast on the popular and respected London Greek radio station. Regrettably, however, the Foreign Secretary's visit lasted for less than 24 hours.

I have a copy of the Foreign Secretary's statement, and the 10 points highlighted by him during his visit. Much of this is well known, as it is based on United Nations statements and resolutions. I assume that the 10 points constitute the Government's policy on Cyprus. I fully support comments such as those about the sovereignty of the Republic of Cyprus and that there will be no right of petition or secession. I also support the security of both Greek and Turkish Cypriots being achieved by international guarantees and the membership of Cyprus of the European Union. No doubt many hon. Members fully support those aims.

Unfortunately, the Foreign Secretary's statement did not include the important issue of the role of Turkey and Ankara. That is a key factor in any negotiations because of Turkey's continuing contacts with Mr. Denktas. Sir David Hannay, the British special envoy to Cyprus, regularly visits Turkey for discussions. We expect Turkey to play a major role in the negotiations. We must never lose sight of the fact that, a year ago, Turkey became a member of the European customs union. As we all know, there are trade-offs in politics. A country that achieves a desirable aim, then, should be helpful on issues on which it has influence, as does Turkey on Cyprus.

I welcome Turkey's involvement, but as one of the guarantor powers for Cyprus and a member of the Commonwealth, we must make it clear that, while Turkey is welcome in the negotiations because of the role that it can play, it will have no veto whatever, and certainly not on a settlement or on the issue of Cyprus's membership of the European Union.

Another issue that was not mentioned in the Foreign Secretary's statement was the demilitarisation of Cyprus. Mr. Clerides, the President of the Republic of Cyprus, has presented a plan for that and such developments are vital because, as we all know, there has been an enormous build-up of arms in Cyprus. It would be interesting to know the view of the Foreign Secretary and the Government on President Clerides' proposals on demilitarisation.

This week, the British press gave a great deal of coverage to the Foreign Secretary's visit. After 22 years of division in the island, we certainly want an honourable settlement. I wish the talks that start next year every success, but already there are demands from Mr. Denktash—as there have been since the events of 1974—in connection with Cyprus's membership of the European Union. He is hostile to that, and has views on sovereignty, security and territory in Cyprus. Yesterday The Independent stated:

"Turks pour cold water on Rifkind's Cyprus mission."

[Mr. Tom Cox]

That shows that, within days of the Foreign Secretary's visit to Cyprus, Turkey is not all that interested in the proposals. Is that true?

I hope that the Government will make their position plain, because hon. Members wish to see the rights of Greek and Turkish Cypriots fully honoured in any settlement. I hope that the Government and all parties represented in the House will make it clear to Mr. Denktash and to Turkey that they must play a constructive role that works towards a settlement. We should set out what we expect from next year's discussions.

The Foreign Secretary has spoken about the importance of the 1997 discussions. We need to know from the Government the role of the United States of America in those talks. The USA has had a special envoy in Cyprus, and the new Secretary of State, Mrs. Madeleine Albright, has a knowledge of Cyprus. The United States certainly has a role to play there, and I hope that we will work in full support of that country throughout the discussions. It knows how crucial are the issues surrounding a united Cyprus, especially because of the continuing tensions in the Mediterranean area, in which Cyprus is an important country.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are 45 minutes to go before the start of the winding-up speeches and, in that time, five hon. Members hope to catch my eye. I hope that they will all be successful.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made a powerful contribution on the issue of railway pensions and sweeteners. I say amen to what she said. I have a question which I hope will be answered during the winding-up speeches. Can the Leader of the House find out from the Treasury its assessment of the proposed saving to the taxpayer of this so-called sweetener operation? The same question could be asked about the privatisation of the Building Research Establishment. With that I couple the question, what will be the objective device that the building industry trusts? If the research facility is privatised, there will be deep questions about whether contractors would be willing to go to a private building organisation in the way that they have gone to the BRE in the past. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) will know about that because he was engaged in running the council.

I wish to raise two matters, one of which is extremely urgent and relates to the dreadful events last night in Lima, Peru. It is not clear whether British subjects were involved. Sally Bowman seems to have got out and it appears that the British ambassador left before the raid started. The incident raises urgent issues, one of which is international violence. For the first time, possibly for hundreds of years, there is no war in the world. However, there is much interfactional violence ranging from events in Chechnya to, now, Lima. I speak as the vice-chairman of the all-party Latin America group. I went to Lima in 1984 and had to go through armed guards to the private house of the ex-Prime Minister, Manuel Ulloa, who was Prime Minister at the time of the Falklands war—which was the subject of my visit. There were also guards when we went to see President Belaunde Terry.

Peru is a violent country and the Shining Path organisation may be among the roughest, toughest and most determined terrorists on the face of the planet. I am sorry for the Government of Peru. This is an urgent matter for us all because there could easily be copycat incidents. First, I seek any kind of information from the Government about British involvement. Secondly, what measures are likely to be taken for the protection of our embassies' where such incidents, alas, are all too likely to happen? We must never underestimate the copycat factor in the light of such an incident. I ask for a statement on that matter.

My last point has been raised endlessly. Can some judgment be arrived at, at last, after eight long years, on the Lockerbie issue? For the first time, there will not be a service this year at Westminster abbey. It is eight years since, on a point of order, on that dreadful evening as the rumours filtered through, I asked about the crash of a huge airliner not far from my constituency.

Not only are the relatives still dissatisfied, but sanctions go on and on against Libya. That damages British industry. There is a project worth about $10 billion, but the beneficiaries are not British firms, as they might have been because many Libyan decision makers were educated at our technical colleges and universities and not, like those in many Arab countries, in the United States. The loss is Britain's. Apart from moral considerations, this is an urgent matter for British industry.

I recognise that, in the early 1980s, the Libyans were not angels. I accept the views of the right hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Needham) and others who have had ministerial responsibility that arms went to the south of Ireland from Libya and that they should not have done, but that is different from saying that Libya was responsible for the Lockerbie crime. It is eight long years since it happened.

Before we come back on 13 January, could some serious consideration be given to the matter? In his answer to my written question yesterday, which has not yet appeared in Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

"The Arab League and some Arab Governments have pressed for sanctions to be lifted and a compromise reached on Lockerbie."

That is also the view of many African Governments. President Mandela wrote a personal letter on the subject to the British Prime Minister. Before we come back, could some serious reflection be given to an on-going, deeply unsatisfactory position?

11.30 am

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who always raises matters of key importance and who campaigns persistently on issues. Many of us should learn from him about the way in which matters should be approached, especially in a debate such as this.

I wish to raise the issue of opencast mining in the north-east corner of Derbyshire. That issue affects the well-being of people in my constituency and in the Chesterfield and Bolsover constituencies.

I want to place this in the context of the pit closure programme. No pits remain in Derbyshire. A European Community document entitled "Commission Report on the Application of the Community Rules for State Aid to the Coal Industry in 1994", which has just been published, points out that, during 1994,

"British mines whose production costs were lower than those in other Member States and which were only slightly subsidised have had to be closed for lack of a market while high-cost mines are still being worked elsewhere in Europe—a situation which has helped push up the amount of aid per tonne in the Community very considerably".

If we had only had a level playing field, we would still have pits and the communities around them in north Derbyshire, and we would not have the problems of opencast mining.

The north-east corner of Derbyshire is built on coal. There are great seams of coal from Leeds to Nottingham and Derby. North-east Derbyshire is in the middle of that. To the western side of the region, there used to be cutterills, drift mines and bell pits. To the east, the mines became deeper, so the ones that were closed were deeper mines, with the communities around them then being devastated. There is now great opencast potential in the region as we do not have the pits, and we are in danger of the green belts becoming black belts.

In the region, Budge, Fitzwise and H. J. Banks are the main operators seeking opencast avenues—and some are operating such mines already. Fitzwise and H. J. Banks have headquarters in my constituency. Arkwright is the major operator in the Bolsover constituency. Its operation involves 3.5 million tonnes and covers 417 hectares, which is a considerable development. In view of that, there should be no further development for some considerable time.

The cumulative impact of the operations—those where plans have been agreed and those where applications have been made—is considerable. I do not know how seriously minerals planning guidance note 3 takes the cumulative impact into account, but historical operations, some of which are still being used for landfill purposes, are not taken into account. The guidance note should be altered, as should much else in the note, to tighten the scope for possible applications considerably.

I raised this matter yesterday at Environment Question Time and I received the wrong answer from the Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency, who said that historical cases were taken into account, which is not so, as anyone who examines MPG note 3 will see.

Derbyshire county council is placed in something of a cleft stick in relation to applications that it receives. It has the MPG hanging over it, and the MPG is disposed towards the acceptance of opencast applications, although the Government deny that. If the council rejects an application, however, the cost of an appeal is a considerable burden for an authority that is strapped for cash. On numerous occasions, I have raised the problems of Derbyshire county council and North East Derbyshire district council in relation to the standard spending assessment and allocation of money from Government sources. That obviously affects this whole game.

My constituents will be affected considerably if three operations go forward. The first is at Avenue Cokeworks, which has been closed. There is considerable contaminated land on the site. It is surrounded by the built-up regions of Grassmoor, Wingerworth, Tupton and Chesterfield to the north. Operations at the works cannot be easily hidden as it is in a valley, with a railway line running through the middle of it. A serious investigation is needed into the impact of operations at Avenue Cokeworks for the work force and nearby residents.

Twenty-nine claimants are operating through a Birmingham solicitor with cases relating mostly to cancer—13 ex-workers and 16 residents. Twelve are women, who live in two streets north-west of Avenue Cokeworks. The agreement that the operation should go ahead should be called in. The case is being pursued through judicial review, but there are massive problems in the region—not just the usual ones involving transport, disruption and the danger of asthma, which is a big problem at Grassmoor primary school, for instance, but serious problems involving the removal of contaminated land.

The idea is to move the former plant and to bury the contamination on the site; yet nearby at Grassmoor Lagoons, where tar and chemicals from Avenue Cokeworks are treated, bio-remediation is going to be used by the county council. If bio-remediation is appropriate in the case of Grassmoor Lagoons, it is likely that it would be also be appropriate in the case of the Avenue Cokeworks.

The second case is at the Breck. The application involves a site north of Barrow Hill and South of Eckington. The majority of the land in question is an attractive green area, currently in intensive agricultural use, with the exception of a disused tip which contains chemical and foundry waste and two oxbow lakes used as a fishery. The opencast operation would last for seven years and would provide for a waste disposal facility that would come into operation within the first year of opencasting and last for a further 19 years.

An average of one train per day would arrive at a railhead to the south of the site. Its 50 sealed containers would be unloaded and transported by road to the site. That would account for 70 per cent. of the waste. The remaining 30 per cent. would arrive entirely by road. If time permitted, I would illustrate the great problems involved in that application. Hon. Members, especially Labour Members, who know the area will understand the difficulties.

The third case is at Heath, next to junction 29 of the M1 motorway. It is a peculiar application which goes first to the district council because there is an argument that platforms should be built for firms operating as redistribution centres. Conveniently, an application will then go to the county council to get out coal that would otherwise be sterilised. The argument is that the ground there will need to be impacted. That is a great problem within the area, because certain firms moved to an industrial estate nearby on the understanding that opencast operations would not take place.

The cases that I have illustrated need to be added to other cases in which applications have already been accepted and where operations are taking place. I commend the Labour party's alternative points about opencast mining, one of which says that there would be a "rejection of planning applications for opencasting where they may prejudice efforts to attract other investment in the locality."

I hope that that would also apply to existing investment, which would cover the third case that I mentioned.

[Mr. Harry Barnes]

These issues should be debated seriously in the House and I hope that there will be an opportunity to do so in a more comprehensive way at a later stage.

11.42 am

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): I want to use my short speech to wish people who live in Nottingham and use the national health service there a happy and healthy Christmas and new year. I also extend that greeting to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am extremely concerned about Nottingham health authority, which meets tomorrow and faces some difficult decisions about priorities. It is fair to remind the Leader of the House that,in the Budget statement last month, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—also a Nottinghamshire Member—told the House that priority would be given to health service issues. He told the Nottingham Evening Post on 27 November:

"I think you will find that he"— the chairman of the health authority—

"has got a lot of extra money."

The reality is quite different. The health authority faces a standstill budget next year.

The basic underlying problem for the health authority is that it has been underfunded against the national formula for many years. In the current year it received 97.22 per cent. as against 100 per cent. funding. Next year, it is suggested that it will receive 97.56 per cent.—a move of just 0.34 per cent. towards the target. I say quietly and determinedly to the Leader of the House that at that rate of change it will take another seven years for it to reach average funding. It is clear to me and to those who live in Nottingham and work in the health service there that it is not receiving its fair share.

I commend everyone in Nottingham who has lobbied on what has become a bipartisan issue. It has involved hon. Members from all parties. I congratulate the chairman and chief executive of the health authority and all who work in the trust. We all want what is best for Nottingham, which is to reach the 100 per cent. target as quickly as possible.

In the longer term, I want to see more than that. Nottingham is a teaching district and, traditionally, teaching districts have had more than 100 per cent. funding. Camden receives 107 per cent., Manchester receives 106 per cent. and Ealing receives 104 per cent. They are all teaching districts. Nottinghamshire has a centre of excellence in the Queen's medical centre and, in the longer term, we need a greater slice of the cake.

Next year the health authority will have an extra £5.85 million to spend on hospital and community health services. However, it is not so clear-cut as that, because the uplift in its budget is just 2 per cent. and inflation will run at more than that. It is again being asked to make efficiency savings of 2.7 per cent. There comes a time when it is impossible to make any more efficiency savings.

In the Queen's medical centre—the biggest hospital in Europe—routine operations are not taking place this month or next month. I speculate—I do not think that I shall be far from the truth—that within the next few weeks major redundancies will be announced at the hospital. The City hospital has faced one efficiency saving after another and cut upon cut. I do not believe that much more can be done to save money there.

I wish the health authority well in its decision making tomorrow. It faces a difficult task and will have to make some hard choices. Its task would be made much easier if it and the people who live in Nottingham had a fair deal and received 100 per cent. funding. The Leader of the House will know that there is still extra money to be allocated within the NHS for next year. Perhaps he could look at the matter and talk to colleagues in the Department of Health so that some extra help can be given to Nottingham and so that people who live there can truly have a happy and healthy Christmas and a successful new year.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): On today's Order Paper there are three early-day motions drawing attention to the deplorable deterioration in the quality, accuracy and truthfulness of answers to questions tabled by hon. Members. It is a serious matter. The three instances quoted are taken almost at random because it has become routine recently to have answers that fit the descriptions that I have mentioned.

One answer is from the Northern Ireland Office. It said that certain documents were in the public domain. After a thorough search, using the time of my staff and the Library, and after a letter to the Department, it had to admit that the documents were not in the public domain.

The second instance refers to a contemptible and contemptuous answer given to an hon. Member last week. When he asked how many representations had been made about the possible closure of benefit offices in Wales, he was told, "A number."

The third issue is a matter of considerable seriousness, and it causes a great many problems not only for my constituents but for the constituents of all hon. Members. I tabled a question about an obligatory form—no other form can be used—to appeal against decisions made on social security matters. I received an answer from a Social Security Minister, telling me that, at my request, he had placed a copy of the form in the Library. No form was in the Library. A fortnight after the regulations came into force, on 21 October 1996, the Minister had to confess that the forms had not yet been printed, and that they would not be printed for a further fortnight. That is an utter disgrace.

The fourth matter does not appear on today's Order Paper—although it should—because the Table Office had difficulties with the wording. It is also a clear case of a Minister not telling the truth to the House. I am limited in the language that I can use in this matter, although we have recently heard such words as "dissembling". In the early-day motion, I stated that the House

"notes the deliberate, calculated untruth contained in a recent answer."

I used those words—instead of "lying", which I would have used outside the Chamber—because there is clear, incontrovertible evidence of a deliberate attempt to mislead the House.

I had tabled a question, which was dealt with by the Metropolitan police. My question is included at the top of the reply from the Metropolitan police, of 15 November 1996. It states:

"Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost of the police participation in the state opening of Parliament."

The reply, of 200 words, then provides the answer to my question, and includes full details and explanations of how the costing was determined and the factors that were considered. It gives a figure of £286,000. Any hon. Member would greet with pleasure such a full and detailed answer. On 20 November, however, I was told by the Home Office:

"costs of police staff who took part in the ceremony are not separately costed."—[Official Report, 20 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 621.]

In fact, they were indeed separately costed: Ministers had that document, and they lied to me. I tabled further questions, asking them to confirm that they had received the document. I received a reply confirming that they had received the figure, but the reply did not contain one syllable of apology or regret about the earlier answer.

I have raised these issues with Madam Speaker, and I shall raise them again. I believe that the events occurring in the dying days of this Parliament demean this institution. They attack the integrity of the House and reduce and undermine the role of all Back Benchers. Although we have the authority of our majorities behind us and we speak not only as individuals, our questions have been answered in that manner. We bring matters to the highest forum in the land, but they are treated in a contemptuous and contemptible manner. The Minister did not confess that he had not answered my question according to the Government's instruction to Ministers not to withhold information because it might be politically embarrassing.

My question was about a matter of great concern. The figures reveal that the state opening of Parliament cost approximately three quarters of a million pounds. Some believe that there should be a state opening once per Parliament and not once a year. There have also been indications that the police and many others resent having to provide 1,500 policemen and 1,500 soldiers for it. The ceremony has become increasingly meaningless. This year, for example, the Queen's Speech was found to be of little value because a few hours after it was made the Prime Minister changed it.

The mother of Parliaments is becoming debauched. Recent events have included "Conway-gate" and the resignation of a Minister, who made no act of contrition. We have used the word "dissembling" about that event. We must remember our role as the mother of Parliaments, and that as leaders of the nation we should set an example of morality. As Chaucer said:

"If gold ruste, what shall iren do?"

11.55 am

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I do not wish to follow the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) down the path that he has been treading. However, I should like to follow his colleague, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), and underscore his plea about Peru. I do so as one whose family members work there and whose cousins were born there. I understand some of its pressures and problems, and also the problem of copycat action around the world.

I should like to say a word of thanks to the Leader of the House. At Business Questions last Thursday, I pressed him on Northern Ireland's omission from the Protection from Harassment Bill. It will now be included by negative resolution.

I believe that the House should not adjourn until it addresses three issues. The first is pressure on residential homes—particularly in Northern Ireland, but also elsewhere. The problem of running the homes is specifically acute in Northern Ireland because the Department of Health and Social Services ultimately holds the purse strings. The point has been bluntly made that in the past 10 years the £260 permitted per week for residents in those homes has not even kept pace with inflation. The tragedy is that statutory homes are allowed more per resident than voluntary or private homes.

Private homes were encouraged to develop, but now they are increasingly being put under strain. The Craigavon trust area, for example, which is responsible for three subsidiary areas, is able to assess and allocate to residential homes only one resident per month. It is also wrong for the Government to rely continually on charitable, voluntary homes to provide care for residents. The reliance is aggravated by the fact that, because of national agreements, auxiliary staff in voluntary homes are paid about 50p less per hour than employees in statutory homes. Staff are trained in voluntary homes, but as soon as there is an opening they move on to better positions in statutory homes, putting more pressure on voluntary homes.

The second issue is more of a constituency matter, concerning the desire of the Sports Council and of the Green Park trust—although the desire has been manifested across the nation—for greater excellence in sportsmanship. The realisation of that goal requires sports medical facilities. I should like to think that the Department of Health in Northern Ireland will help the private sector and those working in the voluntary sector to provide facilities—in a centre for sports medicine, in Musgrave Park hospital, which is part of the Green Park trust—including orthopaedic and physiotherapy care. That is an important objective.

There is a growing belief, which I welcome, that there should be greater participation in sports and that we should raise the standards of our sportsmen. However, injuries occur. That project would provide an opportunity to expand the excellent service already provided by the Gait unit in Musgrave hospital, so that it could serve as a regional centre for excellence for sportsmen and women in Northern Ireland.

My third brief point relates to education. I know that the local management of schools initiative has been going for some time. However, there seem to be differences in its implementation. It appears from information given to me that those schools with fewer than 250 pupils registered are in greater difficulty than the larger schools.

It is a scandal that governors in some schools in Northern Ireland have granted substantial pay increases to principals while the management has had to reduce the number of teaching staff. That will have to be addressed sooner rather than later.

My attention has been drawn to one school in County Down which has not only lost its principal—it was certainly not able to increase his salary—but has now been asked to undertake more work and provide services with a budget already overdrawn by £30,000. The school is being asked to shoulder the increased salary costs of teachers. It is impossible to do that with a deficit budget.

One knock-on effect of that is that rural communities will be disrupted again, with schools being closed by so-called market forces. There will again be a drift from rural communities to the towns. That is not always best, because the harsh reality of life is that, the larger our centres of population, the more the likelihood of growth in deprivation and the development of mischievous incidents. From my experience, larger schools are not necessarily the best, although I attended one that was definitely outstanding. It is important to provide the best education that we can for young people in rural areas. I ask that consideration be given to that cry not just for my constituency, which is urban, but for rural areas throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Given the shortness of the past few speeches, which were models of their kind, there might have been an opportunity for one of the other hon. Members who were in the Chamber earlier to participate. We have not had an overly successful three hours, because the time has not been used as we intended. Three hon. Members—the hon. Members for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), for Basildon (Mr. Amess) and for Castle Point (Dr. Spink)—took 55 minutes between them and raised matters that would be better raised in local government than in the House of Commons.

Having attended many of these debates in the past few years since we changed the procedure, I put it seriously to the Leader of the House that we might consider having a ballot the night before for a mixture of five and 10-minute slots, to be allocated to hon. Members by name, in which they could still raise any subject that they wanted. That would be far better than our current hit and miss procedure, with excessively long early speeches denying many hon. Members the opportunity to raise important matters.

I cannot touch on all the matters that have been raised; nor, I imagine, will the Leader of the House be able to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) talked about the health service in London, saying that it was trolley time again in London hospitals. I suspect that we shall hear a good deal more about that in the early months of next year, as the winter starts to bite.

My hon. Friend also raised the important issue of Cyprus, mentioning the fact that the Foreign Secretary was able to visit for only 24 hours rather than the 48 hours planned. I am sure that the Leader of the House and his Cabinet colleagues will take note that overseas ministerial visits in 1997 will, of necessity, be a good deal shorter than originally planned. That is not good for the conduct of business or for British interests overseas, but it is a consequence of matters being dealt with in the House. That is the price to be paid. There is a net loss to the country as a whole, but, by and large, people will be prepared to pay that price.

My hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) raised the serious issue of opencast mining, particularly the health hazards of the planned and existing opencast mines in north-east Derbyshire. Ministers will have to address those issues. Clearly, the Leader of the House can only pass them on, but Ministers should take a more proactive view.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) mentioned the events in Peru overnight. We would appreciate any up-to-date information that the Leader of the House has.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) made the model speech of the morning. In five minutes, he raised one issue in a targeted way—the health service in Nottingham and Nottinghamshire and the effects on his constituents. I have no doubt that he will be back on that issue in 1997.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) raised the worrying issue of the accuracy of parliamentary answers. The Leader of the House is not responsible for the inaccurate answers, but the accuracy of answers should concern him more than it does most Cabinet Ministers, because he has a House of Commons role. I should be grateful if he would say something about that.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) talked about the BSE crisis—an issue that we shall keep coming back to in 1997, because the bill will fall to the incoming Government. In particular, he raised matters relating to the cull and the gravy train that is operating to the benefit of a few slaughterhouse owners. That has been alluded to in the past. I have been present for many of the statements in the House. The hon. Gentleman made specific allegations that the taxpayer is not getting value for money. It is clear that, if the rules of local government were applied, Ministers at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food would probably be surcharged for not obtaining value for money by proper competitive tendering arrangements.

Another worrying fact made clear by the hon. Member for North Cornwall—I was not aware of this—is that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who is in charge of the public face of the BSE cull, appears not to be accountable to the House for the management of the operations that he is conducting on behalf of the Government. I do not understand how he has escaped that—probably by offloading and transferring written questions. There ought to be some means of accountability to the House by the Minister responsible for the expenditure of more than £2 billion, rising to £3 billion. As I recall from a previous Red Book, that sum amounts to the entire contingency fund.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the worrying fact that only 21 of the 72 approved slaughterhouses were used for the work, with slightly more being used later. The big boys of the industry have clearly ripped off the taxpayer, with much of the hundreds of millions of pounds of public expenditure going to them in direct profit, while probably hundreds, if not thousands, of small businesses have been destroyed. Looking at the figures in detail, it does not make sense that so much of the public expenditure on dealing with the BSE crisis has lined the pockets of the wrong people, to the tune of hundreds of millions of pounds, while so many small businesses have been destroyed. The issue cannot be dealt with in this morning's debate, but when the bills are picked up in 1997, those accountable for the disaster should be required to pay the price. That price will be in more than pounds, shillings and pence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) raised the issue of the British Rail pension fund robbery, which is what it amounts to, given that £8 billion of assets exceed the liabilities by £1 billion. Such "robbery" has been going on for a long time, and is related not only to privatised industries but to the private sector as a whole.

From some figures in the Financial Times this morning, it is clear that the proportion of surpluses being taken by companies is exceeding that returned in benefits to pensioners by a ratio of more than 10:1. If there is inside knowledge or good guesswork on pension fund surpluses, low offers can be submitted for companies—especially those in the public sector—that are put up for sale. Companies are queuing up to pay the Government for up to seven years for the franchise of rail companies, which on the surface does not seem to make sense, because they are laughing all the way to the bank by being able to exploit British Rail pension funds.

Such activity occurs in the private sector, too. Many of my constituents have been affected by Lucas Industries plc raiding the company's pension fund surplus. That company has not paid a penny piece in employers' contributions for years. That is exactly what will happen in the railway industry as companies seek to take a pensions holiday. It is no good anyone saying that the matter rests with the trustees: many of them are quite weak, some turn out to be in the company's pocket and not truly independent, and, although most represent current members who are paying into the fund, they certainly do not represent current pensioners.

The matter will have to be dealt with. I understand that the pensions ombudsman has ordered National Grid to pay £44 million back into the pension fund, which may happen in the rest of the privatised sector. Nevertheless, Ministers should address the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich. If the Leader of the House cannot do so, he should ensure that we get an early and full response from Ministers. There will obviously be investigations—I suspect by the National Audit Office—which will take a long time. It would be very convenient if we could have answers well before the date of the general election is announced so that Ministers can be brought to book for their incompetence in the privatisation of our great national assets.

Although many other hon. Members have spoken, I do not have time to do their speeches justice. I do not think that the debate has been as successful as we could have hoped, due to the abuse of the time for debate by three Conservative Back Benchers.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): In the light of some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and the frustrations expressed earlier in the debate, it is rather ironic that the hon. Gentleman had some minutes more in which to speak than he had asked for and that I shall have nearly 10 minutes more than I had asked for, which should enable me to do more justice than would otherwise have been possible to some of the speeches. I had expected the occasion to be rather more dominated by the Christmas spirit, although we have certainly had the full and varied diet that is associated with Christmas. I shall do my best to digest as much of it as I have time for.

One point raised in several of the early speeches, which I hoped would have been made more often, concerns today's unquestionable seasonal good news about unemployment. Seasonally adjusted claimant unemployment fell today by a record 95,800—down to just over 1.9 million, which is just under 7 per cent. of the work force. I should record that that is the largest monthly fall for 20 years, which brings unemployment down to below 2 million and the total fall since recovery began to more than 1 million.

It is right to make the point that the good news ties in with the outstandingly good report that we received yesterday from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which confirmed that unemployment in the United Kingdom is expected to decline further, and that its unemployment rate over the next two years is expected to be by far the lowest of any major European country and to remain well below the EU average. That is associated with the fact that the OECD expects the United Kingdom to be the fastest growing major European economy this year, next year and in 1998. I was grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) and for Basildon (Mr. Amess) for adverting to those points.

I turn to the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point and for Basildon, partly because they referred to the recent good news and partly because they went on to give the House a fairly extensive political and geographical tour of Essex—the county in which I was born and educated and now partly represent. Despite my long association with the county, I learned even more about its geography this morning.

I am obviously tempted, because I am an Essex Member of Parliament, to join in with the comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point and for Basildon. I can certainly confirm that there are many tensions between the Labour and Liberal Democrat groups on Essex county council, as both my hon. Friends said, and that much of the county council's policy seems to leave a lot to be desired. I draw particular attention to some of the actions that it has taken in respect of school transport. I shall not go further down that line, because I would prefer to concentrate on joining both my hon. Friends in expressing pleasure at the grants that were announced this week by the national lottery's charities arm.

I have experienced the very great pleasure of awards being granted to the Halstead day centre, which is not in my constituency but which I know well, and the Tabor centre for physically handicapped adults, in Braintree, with which I have a quite close association. I know how much pleasure has been given by the awards.

I hope that my hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point and for Basildon will forgive me for picking up on their remarks about proposals concerning the fire services in Essex. I should make it clear that, if a fire authority wants to reduce the number of its fire stations, appliances or firefighting posts, it needs the approval of the Home Secretary. So far, my right hon. and learned Friend has not received any application from Essex county council in respect of Canvey Island fire station, and I assure my hon. Friends that, should the county council make such an application, he will take account of any representations that he receives in reaching his decision. He has obviously received some representations this morning.

I return to the more logical way of replying to the debate—going through it in order and making such comments as I can. My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter) referred to something for which I have my own enthusiasm: the benefits that his part of the country has experienced from the single regeneration budget announcements earlier this week and from the capital challenge. I was aware of the Lowestoft and the Suffolk Prosper bids to which he referred, because I act as a sort of honorary Minister for eastern England when such announcements are made. Indeed, I gave interviews on them to Radio Norfolk and Radio Suffolk and know how much encouragement they will have given the area. I hope that my hon. Friend will be encouraged to know that east Braintree's regeneration plans were the subject of a successful bid in round 1 of the SRB, and one can already see the transformation on the ground of what was an old industrial part of the town.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) referred to a number of points, but spent most of his speech on poverty. His speech was not as balanced as I would have hoped, even allowing for his political perspective. He failed entirely to acknowledge that the vast majority of people in this country are better off and that, since 1979, average income has risen by more than a third, even after allowing for inflation.

In using figures of the numbers of people on income-related benefit—as if that was some measure of poverty—the hon. Member for Walsall, North did not take any account at all of something about which I know a great deal because I did much work on it while I was Secretary of State for Social Security: in many respects, those figures reflect improvements in the benefit system. There are more people on income-related benefits, due to the huge improvement in the extension of family credit, the introduction of a carers' premium, disability premiums and better and larger premiums for older pensioners. The hon. Gentleman paid no attention to those factors in what I thought was a grossly over-simplified presentation.

Mr. Winnick: Obviously we shall have to agree to disagree about that, but when I say that the bottom 10th of the population as regards income are 17 per cent. worse off in absolute terms than in 1979, is the right hon. Gentleman really telling me that he disputes that? That is an important figure, as are the other figures that I gave about people living in poverty; I notice that he has not commented on those.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman put great weight on what I regard as very over-simplified statistics, in an over-simplified presentation. I have given some pretty compelling reasons to support my belief that it was oversimplified. Obviously, we do not have time for an extended debate on the details of all the statistics, but I have made my point and I cleave to it.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was one of a number of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) and the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Perry Barr, who mentioned parliamentary questions. I take a close interest in that matter, and as it happens, the hon. Lady, who appears to have left her seat, has recently written—

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am here.

Mr. Newton: She is a peripatetic hon. Lady, and has now appeared in what for her is a rather unusual part of the Chamber. Perhaps she is practising to be part of the gang that sits on the Opposition Bench below the Gangway. None the less, I am glad to see her in her place.

The hon. Lady, among others, made some remarks about parliamentary questions. I shall consider with great care what was said, including what the hon. Member for Newport, West said about the State Opening of Parliament. The hon. Lady has written to me recently about related matters, and I am considering those, but it may be appropriate if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster replies, because he was in charge of the exercise that led to the publication of clearer guidelines on answering parliamentary questions. Of course, I always take the hon. Lady's comments seriously.

I accept that, as the hon. Lady said, there is a tendency for a flood of questions to be answered on the last day before a recess, but I think that the hon. Lady is being unduly cynical about the reasons that she attributed for that.

Part of the problem is caused by the huge increase in the volume of parliamentary questions asked, and by the pressure from hon. Members, who sometimes table questions at a late stage before a recess, not to mention the pressure within Departments to publish answers more quickly than they otherwise would. If questions are not answered today, they cannot be answered until 13 January, and if they were left until then, Departments would be criticised for that reason instead. I hope that the hon. Lady will at least acknowledge that point.

The main thrust of the hon. Lady's speech, which was added to by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and to some degree by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, concerned railway pensions. Hon. Members will have observed that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport not only heard her remarks but has come into the Chamber to hear mine, having had a word with me in the intervening period. I can therefore assure the hon. Lady that my right hon. Friend has taken note of what she said, although I hope that he will not mind my saying that some of his comments on it were less than flattering.

I must make it clear that the position regarding British Rail pensioners' rights will be no less favourable as a result of privatisation. The new arrangements replicate as far as possible those in place under BR, and include safeguards governing the use of surpluses. It is in the nature of a scheme funded jointly by employers and employees—60 per cent. is paid by the one and 40 per cent. by the other—that, when surpluses occur, they should be shared.

I went through a similar argument in a previous capacity when I was the Minister responsible for occupational pensions. In general terms, the topic has been the subject of endless argument over the years, and there has been fresh legislation. I suspect that were a deficit to emerge, the hon. Lady would be the first to demand that the employers find the money to fill it. There must be some balance between the two.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I understand what the right hon. Gentleman is saying, but the Government have written in so many exemptions for the private companies that there is no doubt that they would expect other people to support any deficit that appeared. My point is simpler than that: they are taking money to which they are not entitled, and they will make darn sure that they do not pay for any deficits.

Mr. Newton: As my time is now diminishing by the minute, I cannot say more to the hon. Lady than that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has listened to what she has said—although I must admit that I could hear him uttering dissenting noises from a sedentary position. I am sure that he will come back to her on the subject if he feels it appropriate.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) continued what I acknowledge has been a long and vigorously fought campaign on matters related to BSE. He, probably more than almost anyone else, will be aware that the House had an extensive opportunity, if not to debate the matter, at least to question the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about BSE-related matters after his statement on Monday. Clearly I cannot go over all the ground again in a short speech.

I managed to follow the hon. Gentleman's speech from afar, although I was not in the Chamber at the time, and it struck me as, to put it mildly, somewhat tendentious. Much of what he said was based on 20:20 hindsight. Whatever the genesis of the 30-months scheme may have been, it was undoubtedly supported by the National Farmers Union, partly because farmers recognised that they would not sell any beef from animals older than 30 months unless something along those lines was done.

The hon. Gentleman might have acknowledged the fact that the result of the scheme was an increase in consumer confidence in the British market substantially more rapid than occurred in many other countries in Europe, and that that brought advantage to the British industry.

Mr. Tyler: Can the right hon. Gentleman give one assurance to the House—that, if the Public Accounts Committee and the National Audit Office wished to go through the books and see exactly what happened, the Government would co-operate fully?

Mr. Newton: Of course the Government will always co-operate with properly constituted bodies of that kind. Beyond that, these are not matters on which I can comment off the cuff on the Floor of the House this morning. None the less, I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's remarks are drawn to the attention of the appropriate Ministers.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has been criticised in some respects—in my view, unfairly. In relation to the BSE culling arrangements, he is in the same position as I am on a range of other matters—that of chairing a Cabinet Committee or a co-ordinating group of Ministers. Executive responsibility remains with those Ministers. A co-ordinating arrangement is necessary, because many Departments are involved. We have four Departments responsible for agriculture, and other Departments have a strong interest in the issue too. The criticisms of my right hon. Friend, who has been assiduous and has done an effective job, are therefore unreasonable and unfair.

I am coming to the end of the time allowed, and I should comment briefly on what was said by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), without whom no debate of this nature would be complete these days. He made a traditional "Tooting speech", starting with hospitals and ending with Cyprus. I noted carefully what he said, and shall ensure that it is drawn to the attention of the appropriate Ministers.

I cannot comment on everything said by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, who made a characteristic speech—I mean that as a compliment, not as some sort of disguised insult. The latest information that I have on the incident in Lima, which is not as complete as I would like, is that it is possible that some British nationals are in the residence. I cannot say more at this stage. The United Kingdom is in close touch with the Peruvian authorities, and we understand that negotiations are under way. We shall of course pass on any further information at the earliest opportunity, as it emerges.

I do not think that the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) would expect me to comment in detail on the points that he made in an excellent constituency speech. I shall ensure that they are drawn to the attention of those of my hon. Friends who are concerned with such matters in detail, just as I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health to what was said by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping).

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) for the words of thanks that he expressed for the action that we took to enable the Protection from Harassment Bill to extend to Northern Ireland. I take note of the fact that he took the trouble to acknowledge that; we were glad to be able to meet him in that respect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) told me that he wanted me to take note of what he said rather than to comment extensively on it. As he also told me that he would not be able to be here for my winding-up speech, I shall make little further comment, other than to say that I have several points that I think he would find encouraging, and I shall try to communicate them to him in other ways.

Those points include the fact that a public inquiry into the statutory orders needed for the Northfleet bypass scheme will be held before mid-April 1997. I understand that there has been much frustration among the scheme's supporters about delays in progress on that important matter. However, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, those delays have not been of the Government's making.

Because of the slightly unexpected additional time that I had, I have been able to comment on almost every speech. I hope that my comments will enable hon. Members to depart at least slightly happier than when they arrived and that they all, including you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will have the sort of relaxed and enjoyable Christmas that I am sure they all—or at least some of them—deserve.

Nigeria

12.29 pm

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): I thank the Minister for agreeing to an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), who has a long record of support for the Nigerian democratic movement, with especially close links to the Nigerian Organisation for Democracy with Integrity. I am also pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), who has led Labour's campaign against the Nigerian military dictatorship.

Three and a half years ago, on Saturday 12 June 1993, in a jungle clearing south of Benin City, I observed the people of the township of Nikrogha voting in the Nigerian presidential election. Voting was orderly and conducted in a spirit of optimism, and procedures were entirely correct. On the same day, 14 million other Nigerians voted. The turnout was variable, but, as hundreds of international observers and thousands of Nigerian election monitors universally reported, the vote was free and fair.

Chief Moshood Abiola was the unquestionable democratic winner, with majorities across all regions—a genuinely unifying and national mandate for his presidency. We are all familiar with the sequence of events that followed: the annulment of the elections by the then military dictator, Babangida, to nationwide protests; and the assumption of power shortly afterwards by the current military dictator, Abacha, who proceeded to ban political parties, dismantle the existing democratic structures—including state and federal legislatures—and replace civilian state governors with military administrators.

Resistance to the military regime continued. In May 1994, the National Democratic Coalition, NADECO, was created. Soon afterwards, the national assembly reconvened to declare the Abacha Government illegal. In June 1994, Abiola returned to claim his presidency. His arrest on 23 June provoked nationwide strikes led by petroleum workers. In associated demonstrations, hundreds of people were gunned down. Abiola and Frank Ovie Kokori, the leader of the petroleum workers, have remained in detention since 1994.

Bizarrely, even the so-called constitutional conference, set up by Abacha to implement his transition programme and largely appointed by the military, voted in December to end military rule by 1 January 1996, a recommendation that was subsequently reversed after the arrest of the originator of the proposal, Shehu Musa Yar'adua. Wherever and whenever they have had the opportunity, Nigerians have always chosen the path of democracy. It is our duty as democrats to support them in that demand.

Just over a year ago, the world was horrified by the execution of Ken Saro-Wiwa and eight other Ogoni leaders in an act described by our Prime Minister as judicial murder. Nineteen Ogonis remain on trial for murder in connection with the same facts and before the same so-called civil disturbances special tribunal that convicted Saro-Wiwa and his co-defendants. That execution is the most extreme and best-known example of the military regime's open contempt for human rights.

The authorities in Nigeria continue to resort to arbitrary detention of prisoners of conscience, ignoring court orders whenever it suits them. Political prisoners continue to face the prospect of unfair trials by special tribunals with the power to impose the death sentence. Detainees continue to be denied access to lawyers, families and essential medical treatment. There are continuing allegations of extra-judicial executions by Nigerian law enforcement officials.

In June and July 1995, former Head of State General Olusegun Obasanjo, Shehu Musa Yar'adua, and 41 other individuals were tried in secret before a military tribunal on charges of plotting a coup against the military Government. They were denied legal representation of their choice, and there was no appeal procedure. Many Nigerians believe that the charges were simply a device to remove military officers and others who posed a threat Abacha's hold on power.

Also swept up in the charges were Dr. Beko Ransome-Kuti, the chairman of the Campaign for Democracy, and four journalists—Christine Anyanwu, Kunle Ajibade, George Mbah, and Ben Charles Obi—whose guilt consisted solely of publishing articles commenting on the trial. Amnesty International believes that all the so-called coup plotters are prisoners of conscience.

There is a strong suspicion that the regime is resorting to political assassination to supplement its manipulation of the judicial system. In October 1995, Pa Alfred Rewane, a major supporter of the National Democratic Coalition, was shot dead in Lagos in a hail of bullets. In early 1996, Alex Ibru, publisher of the liberal newspaper The Guardian, was the subject of an attempted assassination.

On 4 June 1996, Alhaja Kudirat Abiola, senior wife of Chief Abiola and the principal campaigner on her husband's behalf, was murdered in Lagos, in circumstances that have led many to fear that her assassination may have been carried out by Government agents, acting with or without the knowledge of the central authorities. The Government have failed to initiate an immediate, thorough and impartial investigation of her killing.

Apologists for the regime sometimes claim that dissidence is not widespread in Nigeria, and that there is little evidence of internal dissent. It has been aptly remarked that, if dissent is limited, it is the silence of the graveyard. Meanwhile, the Abacha regime has announced its own leisurely programme of transition to democracy, designed to culminate in the swearing in of a newly elected president on 1 October 1998. The programme bears an uncanny resemblance to the abortive Babangida transition programme, and has already been marked by a travesty of local government elections earlier this year and a process of party formation in which none of the parties have managed to meet the Government guidelines.

We cannot leave the transition to democracy in the hands of the military junta. The regime has no democratic legitimacy, and the transition to democracy can have no credibility unless it is carried out in a climate of genuine democratic participation and observation of human rights.

The demands on the regime are clear: the release of all political prisoners and credible guarantees that free and fair elections will go ahead as soon as possible, and well before the proposed date of 1998. It is equally clear that exhortation alone will not persuade the generals. The international community will have to ratchet up its pressure on the Nigerian regime to secure those objectives. That will mean readiness to deploy sanctions beyond those already applied in the aftermath of the Ken Saro-Wiwa execution last November.

The extra sanctions have been well ventilated and were recommended for consideration by the United States, the European Union and the Commonwealth by the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group after its second meeting in April this year. It recommended a ban on air links and additional economic measures, including the freezing of the financial assets and bank accounts in foreign countries of members of the regime and their families. They have been backed by members of the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group, such as New Zealand and Jamaica, and have been unilaterally imposed by Canada. The virtue of those measures is that they target members of the regime and the elites that sustain it, without increasing the suffering of the population in general.

Britain's historic and cultural links with Nigeria, not least our key role in its economy, make it natural that we should take the lead in renewed international pressure against the regime. The British Government must use their status as the foremost partner in the Commonwealth to co-ordinate a clear and consistent strategy against Abacha and his cohorts. We have the machinery in the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group, of which we are a member, to enable us to act now.

There is widespread suspicion that Britain has so far exerted its influence to retard effective international action against the generals. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that that is not so. In any case, we do not have long to wait for the election of a Labour Government, who will be whole-heartedly committed to the restoration of human rights and democracy in Nigeria.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) for allowing me a few moments to intervene.

We are both sponsors of the Nigerian Organisation for Democracy with Integrity, which is based in the United Kingdom. It is not the only organisation in Britain, the United States or in other countries outside Nigeria that is campaigning vigorously for the restoration of respect for human rights and public integrity in that country. I hope that the Nigerian authorities are aware of the depth of feeling about conditions in that country, not just among Nigerians in that country but among those abroad and their friends and allies, among whom I hope that we can number everyone in the House today.

It is a tragedy that Nigeria should be saddled with a dictatorship, violence and corruption, not least because of its great natural resources of oil and in agriculture. The natural appetite of its people for education means that they are well adapted to move forward in the world, so it is also a tragedy that a country that should be leading Africa is so far down the league and kept there by the corruption of its current leaders and their dictatorial system.

In common with my hon. Friend, I ask for an announcement from the Government to the effect that further pressure will be applied by the international community, not least by the Commonwealth, to encourage a return to civilian rule and the restoration of respect for human rights and public integrity. The truth is that democracy will not work successfully in Nigeria unless its society is free of corruption and respects public institutions and the rights of its ordinary people.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the time has come to intensify those pressures. One of the most dramatic reasons for that, although not the only one, was supplied to me in a letter from the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department about constituents, in which he spoke of

> "concerns about the lack of progress towards civilian democratic rule for Nigeria, and the human rights record there, including the appalling executions of Ken Saro-Wiwa, a minority rights activist, and eight of his associates following a flawed judicial process."

Those are not my words, but those of a Home Office Minister, yet nothing has been done to redeem the situation created by the execution of Ken Saro-Wiwa and his fellow Ogonis. No apology has been forthcoming. Nineteen other members of the Ogoni tribe have been kept in detention without trial since 1994. When one recalls what happened to Ken Saro-Wiwa, perhaps we should not press for those people to be brought to trial. We should, however, argue that those people, who have been kept imprisoned without trial for two years and have not been subject to any proper judicial process, should be released.

The second reason for intensifying our pressure on Nigeria is General Abacha's attitude. Although he says that he wants a transition to civilian rule and wants to encourage the creation of political parties, they are nothing more than sweetheart parties, because the only effective opposition there is the Nigerian Democratic Coalition—NADECO. When its representatives campaign, however, their offices are raided, they are arrested, and they are not allowed to participate in elections.

As my hon. Friend said, political assassinations continue, and I can add to his list the death of Dr. Shola Adeshola, who was recently killed by a car bomb when driving. That bomb was believed to be intended for his brother, who is a leading member of NADECO in Nigeria.

No political prisoners have been released, and the 2,000 Ogoni people who were dispersed from the River State have not been encouraged to return to it. The wasteland created as a result of oil exploitation has not benefited from any major environmental rehabilitation. The only plan seems to be to try to civilianise the dictatorship rather than return Nigeria to a democracy.

The time has come for the international community to apply more pressure and to turn the screw. Nigeria is tragically falling behind because of the regime that has been allowed to continue there. We have many Nigerian friends in this country, and we hope to hear the Minister announce plans to intensify pressure to ensure that the restoration of respect for human rights and democracy will at long last come about.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Dr. Liam Fox): I congratulate the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) on obtaining the debate, and I welcome the fact that he chose such an important topic. I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) not only for his contribution, but for his extreme courtesy in getting his timing so impeccably correct.

[Dr. Liam Fox]

I should like to start by discussing the actions of the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group, which, if the House will forgive me, I will refer to as CMAG for the rest of the debate.

The group's representatives visited Nigeria on 18 to 20 November to continue their assessment of Nigeria's adherence to the Harare principles of good governance, as mandated by the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Auckland last year. I remind the House exactly of the Harare principles, which place particular emphasis on which are defined as democracy; democratic processes and institutions; the rule of law and the independence of judiciary; just and honest government; and fundamental human rights. The hon. Members spoke about all those issues.

My right hon. Friend Baroness Chalker represented the United Kingdom at that meeting, and, far from retarding progress on those issues, she has been an important member of the group, and represents the Government and the country in pushing the process forward. I know that her commitment to reform in Nigeria is without doubt.

Sadly, the Canadian delegation was unable to participate in the visit, as Nigeria refused to issue visas to two security officers who were due to travel with the Canadian Minister. That is indicative of the sort of problem that we still face in our current negotiations.

I should also report that the Nigerians pressed once again, not surprisingly, for Nigeria's suspension from the Commonwealth to be rescinded; for CMAG to support the transitional programme; for all sanctions to be lifted; and for the resumption of high-level dialogue. There are quite a few conditions that must be met before that can be achieved.

In addition to the Nigerian delegation, CMAG met representatives of the National Electoral Commission and the transitional committees, as well as the leaders of the five recently registered political parties, traditional rulers and the chairman of the Nigerian Human Rights Commission. The group also had an audience with General Abacha, but was not able to see Chief Abiola, General Obasanjo or any other political prisoners. Baroness Chalker met representatives of the human rights and pro-democracy groups in the margins of the visit.

I am pleased to report that the Nigerians released three high-profile political prisoners during the visit: Femi Falana, Gani Fawehinmi and Femi Aborishade. Like CMAG, I welcome their release, but I want to make it clear to the House that is not nearly enough. The group pressed for the prompt restoration of accountable civilian government; the immediate release of all political prisoners, including Chief Abiola; the rapid resolution of the case of the 19 Ogonis who face the same charges as Ken Saro-Wiwa and his associates; and a review of prison conditions. All those conditions must be met.

The Nigerians were questioned in detail about the implementation of the transition timetable, including the delay in promulgating the draft constitution and the opportunities for unregistered parties to participate in the process, which we regard as an important, not a nominal, part of any proper democratic process. In addition, they were questioned about the mechanisms for conducting the local elections that are scheduled to take place this month.

The Nigerians assured the group that the transition was on track, although they said, in their terms, that they did not believe that it was logistically possible to conduct the local elections this month. If there are logistical reasons for their not being carried out this month, we hope that they are carried out as soon as is practicably possible, because it is not acceptable for logistics to be given as a reason for a delay in implementing proper democratic reforms.

The majority of those to whom CMAG spoke, both those in the Government and others, expressed confidence in the transition process. The group was also informed that most of the politicians whose associations had not registered in September had now joined one of the five registered parties.

The group also expressed its deep concern about the lack of respect for the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary, and the use of rule by decree, which concentrates power in the hands of the regime. The group requested clarification on several decrees that impinged on fundamental rights. Not surprisingly, the Nigerian side responded only that rule by decree was not unusual in military regimes. That practice must change.

CMAG made it clear to the Nigerian authorities that it expects the Ogoni Nineteen to be released or brought before a properly constituted court that respects the basic legal rights of the defendant. It also pointed out that any further trials by the same tribunal that tried Ken Saro-Wiwa would provoke a strong international reaction. The group also called again for the Nigerians to receive and to co-operate fully with the visit by the two United Nations Commission on Human Rights thematic rapporteurs.

The hon. Member for Streatham mentioned Amnesty International's recent report. The Government welcome that report and the 10-point programme for human rights reform in Nigeria. Those useful documents were circulated to all members of CMAG before the visit. The group handed a copy of both documents to the Nigerians in Abuja for their urgent attention and, more important, for their response, which we await with interest.

What will be the next steps? CMAG will meet again in the new year to consider the material it received during the visit, and to agree on next steps in preparation for the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Edinburgh next October. We hope that that meeting will also hear submissions from key Nigerian opposition groups in exile and relevant international non-governmental organisations.

We shall be working towards a fair assessment that reflects the wide range of views that CMAG has heard since it began its assessment last December. It is too early to comment on CMAG's recommendations for the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting next year, but it is clear that Nigeria is still in breach of the principles set out in the Harare declaration, and Nigeria's suspension will have to be considered in that context.

I am pleased to inform the House that the United Kingdom co-sponsored another critical resolution that was adopted by the UN General Assembly on 12 December. The resolution criticises Nigeria's human rights record, and calls on it to implement all the recommendations contained the UN fact-finding mission's report.

The resolution also recognises the important work being done by CMAG, and calls for continued co-operation between the Commonwealth and the United Nations. Such co-operation is an issue that is and should be important to the entire international community. The greater the level of co-operation between the UN, CMAG, the European Union and individual Governments, the better. The European Union has rolled over its common position on Nigeria, which means that all EU measures introduced at the end of last year remain firmly in place.

All those decisions combine to send a clear message to the Nigerians that the international community remains resolved and is working together to keep up the pressure on Abacha and his regime to restore human rights and democracy.

The hon. Gentleman asked several questions about where we go from here, and I should like to take those one by one. First, there is the question of further Commonwealth sanctions. The Commonwealth has already taken the significant step of suspending Nigeria's membership of the association. No other organisation has taken that step, so it is important in itself.

CMAG's mandate is to assess Nigeria's adherence to the Harare principles and to make recommendations to the Commonwealth Heads of Government—CMAG is not a sanction-making body. The April package of measures remains on the table, and CMAG has not yet recommended its implementation to the Heads of Government, but we await any decision on that.

The United Kingdom, together with the European Union, has had measures in place since July 1993, and they were reinforced by adoption measures by means of EU common positions on 20 November 1995 and 4 December 1995. Our aim is to identify carefully targeted measures that will be effective and send a clear signal of our concerns to the regime without wrecking the Nigerian economy, and without imposing any more hardship on its 100 million people than is required to achieve our political objectives.

Dr. Fox: I see the hon. Gentleman nodding—he understands that it is most difficult to achieve the right balance when any form of sanction is being used to try to achieve political ends.

The full list of EU measures is now suspension of non-essential high-level visits in both directions; suspension of military training; an EU-wide arms ban; visa restrictions; the suspension of development co-operation except for projects in support of human rights and democracy and those concentrating on poverty alleviation; the withdrawal of all military personnel attached to diplomatic representations of EU member states in Nigeria and the expulsion of military personnel attached to Nigerian diplomatic representations in member states; and an interruption of sporting contacts through the denial of visas for official delegations and national teams.

We have noted calls for further economic sanctions, including the severing of trade links, an oil embargo and an assets freeze. In our view, those would require a UN Security Council resolution to be effective, and an oil embargo would, in addition, have to be implemented through a naval blockade. We judge such sanctions to be, in practice, unachievable at present.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned an air links ban, but, again, we believe that that would be effective only if applied unanimously by the whole international community. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has made it clear that the UK is not prepared to support an air links ban unless it is supported by all its European and Commonwealth partners.

The issue of defence exports is often raised. On 11 November 1995, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced a full UK arms embargo against the Nigerian military, and on 20 November the European Union adopted a common position that extended measures in force since June 1993 to include a full EU-wide arms ban. The restrictions now in place include all military, security and paramilitary goods and arms, ammunition and related material. The rules do not distinguish between items intended for the military and those intended for the police; nor will any exception be allowed for international peacekeeping operations in which the Nigerians might be involved. Sometimes there is confusion on that last point.

I should like to speak on one subject that the hon. Gentleman did not mention—our position on aid and the UK aid programme. Development co-operation is suspended, except for projects in support of human rights and democracy and those concentrating on poverty alleviation.

The UK adheres strictly to the EU common position, being confined to projects bringing direct benefits to poor Nigerians in health, population, water, basic education and small-scale agriculture, using non-military channels such as non-government organisations. Our bilateral expenditure has inevitably dropped from £12 million in 1992-93 to £4.8 million in 1995-96, but it is starting to increase again this year as our new sector programmes develop.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Streatham for initiating the debate and giving me the chance to clarify some of the points that he raised. The Government take the issue extremely seriously. The present Conservative Government are fully committed to democracy, the rule of law, human rights and sustainable development for all the peoples of Nigeria.

Ecclesiastical Heritage

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak briefly about one of my favourite subjects. Almost the first thing that I did when I entered the House was to begin moves to introduce a Bill to make public funds available for ecclesiastical buildings in use, because until 1977 they were not.

I am delighted that my campaign met with some success. I joined and was joined by many others. For almost 20 years, the Church of England especially has had cause to be grateful for the funds that have come its way. I say that to emphasise the fact that this is not a carping speech. I hope that I shall say some important things about the preservation of England's churches and cathedrals. I mean no insult to anyone, present or not present, by concentrating on Church of England buildings, because the problem of historic churches is essentially a Church of England problem.

The Church of England has about 16,000 churches, about 13,000 of which are listed buildings, and of course it has 42 cathedrals. Forty per cent. of grade 1 listed buildings in England are ecclesiastical.

It is an appropriate time to talk about churches and cathedrals, to which I hope people throughout the country will flock next Wednesday, which is Christmas day. They will be fuller then than probably at any other time of the year—fuller than most of them will be at Easter. That draws attention to the use of our places of worship.

Many of those who do not choose to go to church next week nevertheless recognise the central importance of the church. In most towns and villages, the church is the most important public building, almost always the most outstanding architecturally and the one with the most interesting history. If one believes, as I do, that one comes closest to the soul and the spirit of a nation in its historic buildings, one recognises the central importance of our churches and cathedrals.

I am glad to see my friend, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), in the Chamber. I apologise to him for the fact that I shall not speak about Scottish churches today, but he takes a well-informed interest in all heritage matters and it is always good to see him in our debates.

A month ago today, the Archbishop of Canterbury launched an initiative with a press conference at Lambeth palace. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of National Heritage is well aware of that. I am glad that he will reply to the debate; he is one of my oldest friends in the House, and no one could question his commitment to the civilised things of life.

The archbishop's initiative, which is encapsulated in the document that I hold in my hand, entitled "Developing the Partnership between Church and State over the Ecclesiastical Heritage", is concerned with developing and strengthening that partnership. I emphasise the word "partnership". After all, we are speaking of our national, established Church—the Church whose services and ministrations are available for every man, woman and child in England, and which therefore has enormously important commitments of mission and worship.

No sensible cleric regards our great, rich legacy of historic churches as anything other than a wonderful asset. One has only to think of some of one's favourite churches to recognise the transcendant beauty of such buildings. I think of my native Lincolnshire, which I left many years ago: of churches as glorious as Louth, Boston and Stow and of little gems such as Snarford. In my adopted county of Staffordshire, in the diocese of Lichfield, I think especially of my parish church at Enville, where I am churchwarden and where, during the past few years, we have struggled to raise about £110,000 to maintain our church.

That says it all, in a way. We have a population of fewer than 400. There is a similar number on the electoral roll. We have received, and are grateful for, state aid, and we have received aid from the Historic Churches Preservation Trust, of which I happen to be a trustee. Nevertheless, we have had to raise a very large sum ourselves. We have done it, and it has brought the community together. We welcomed the challenge, but we would not welcome another one next year because there is a limit to the amount of money that small communities can raise, and a recognition of that is at the heart of the archbishop's commendable initiative.

It is calculated that it costs about £100 million a year to maintain the fabric of the churches and cathedrals of the Church of England. About 75 per cent. of that comes from the Church and from voluntary giving and fund raising, and 25 per cent. comes from grant and lottery money. Welcome as grants are, the sum received from English Heritage is about £11 million—about £5 million less than the VAT that the Church pays on repairs. Every Minister should ponder that figure.

If we are to continue to be regarded as a civilised nation, the Government have a responsibility to ensure that the greatest buildings in our country are properly maintained. At the moment, most of our churches and cathedrals are in good repair. As the archbishop said when he launched his document a month ago, in very many cases they have never been in better repair. Yet, looking into the next century and beyond, one must recognise that the continuing burden will be too much for the Church and congregations effectively to discharge unless more help is given.

Today, I am appealing for a recognition of that fact, and of other facts too. The lottery money is certainly welcome, although there are certain reservations about it in Church quarters—reservations that I can well understand. Still, the money has been welcomed by the Archbishop and by those who have the care of our churches, but it is not enough. We are, after all, asking for only a very small sum of money. The budget of English Heritage is being cut. We need more funding from that source, but English Heritage cannot provide more core funding if its resources are being cut.

The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for National Heritage and other Ministers have said repeatedly that the lottery money is regarded as additional to Government money, stressing time and again that it is never to be seen as a substitute for Government funding, but it is becoming a substitute. Later today we shall have an opportunity to debate the Second Reading of the National Heritage Bill, and if I am fortunate enough to catch the Speaker's eye, I may be able to develop some of those arguments then. For now, I merely put down a marker. Ministers must face up to the facts of Government funding; we need more core funding from English Heritage.

We also need money to compensate for the £16 million that the Church pays out in VAT. Perhaps it will be possible to negotiate with Brussels a better rate of VAT on repairs to listed buildings throughout the Community. Perhaps also we might take another look at differing rates of VAT in this country. After all, by decision of the House, the VAT rate on fuel is already 8 per cent. Why not an 8 per cent. rate in this case too?

We also need more money for the Churches Conservation Trust, the body that used to be called the Redundant Churches Fund, which maintains the fabric of churches that are no longer regularly used for worship but are of architectural or historic importance. Those churches, vested in Church and state, will need, we calculate, about £3.3 million more if they are to be effectively maintained over the next three years. The same money could buy only a very small bit of a bypass or motorway.

Next year, we shall commemorate the 1,400th anniversary of the arrival of St. Augustine, in 597. Two years after that, we shall begin to celebrate the millennium. People often forget when they talk glibly of the millennium that it is the 2,000th anniversary of the birth of our Lord. There is surely no more fitting way to commemorate the millennium than by guaranteeing the churches and cathedrals of this land the necessary funding to take them through to the next century and beyond.

I am talking about a matter of £5 million a year extra; that would take care of most of the points mentioned by the Archbishop in his press conference. Set in the national context, that is a tiny sum, yet it will ensure that some of the greatest buildings, not just in this country but in Europe, are secure for the future. That is what the debate is all about: making sure that our churches and cathedrals remain the focal points of our towns and villages and of many a wonderful rural landscape. Although congregations will still have a responsibility, they will be able to devote more energy and resources to the other tasks confronting the Church. Bearing in mind the state of our society today, I submit that there never was a time when there was more need for the Christian message to be heeded.

I ask the Minister once again to heed my plea today. I hope that he will not just tell me what has already been done, because I recognise that with gratitude. I hope that he will tell me that more is going to be done and that it is recognised that more must be done if we are to keep faith with our Christian heritage.

1.15 pm

The Minister of State, Department of National Heritage (Mr. Iain Sproat): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) on his success in securing this short debate. He brings to our heritage, especially our ecclesiastic heritage, not just immense expertise but the sort of passionate commitment that has been on display again this morning. I shall try to explain what can be done and how matters can be taken forward, but, especially for the sake of those who will read the debate, I should also like to put the subject in context by touching on what has already been done. I understand, nevertheless, that my hon. Friend wants to take matters beyond that.

I certainly agree that historic religious buildings stand at the very heart of our national heritage. As my hon. Friend said, it is estimated that nearly 15,000 listed buildings are in religious use, 13,000 of them churches of the Church of England. Of the buildings listed grade I—the top grade, representing only 2 per cent. of all listed buildings—well over a third are Anglican parish churches.

The importance of the ecclesiastical heritage lies not merely in its prodigious quantity but in its astonishing richness and diversity. It reflects every phase in the history of architecture from Saxon times up to the present century. It encompasses buildings of every size and style, from tiny mediaeval churches in remote countryside areas to huge Victorian masterpieces in the inner cities; from nonconformist chapels to the great Anglican cathedrals. It offers countless examples of artistic and technical achievement, and it attracts millions of visitors every year from home and abroad.

Moreover, we appreciate those buildings for more than their intrinsic architectural and artistic qualities. We value the unique contribution that they make to the appearance of the countryside and the townscape. At a deeper level, we are aware of their role in the development of communities and of the nation. We acknowledge their significance as enduring symbols of religious faith through the centuries.

The Government are totally committed to preserving the ecclesiastical heritage in all its fullness. That commitment extends to the historic buildings of all religious denominations and faiths. I well recognise, however, that in initiating this debate my hon. Friend has a particular concern for the buildings of the Church of England. I shall therefore concentrate on that aspect when responding to him.

As my hon. Friend has pointed out, it has long been accepted that care of the Church of England's heritage involves a partnership between the Church itself and the state. Such a partnership has in fact existed for many years, and has achieved remarkable results. The credit for that can be shared equally between both partners. The Church of England has an excellent record in looking after its historic buildings. I readily accept that caring for those buildings and their contents is a heavy responsibility, much of which must be borne by churchgoers themselves.

Therefore, I am very glad to take this opportunity to pay tribute to all those individual congregations who do so much to preserve that outstanding part of the nation's heritage, not least my hon. Friend's village church. For a population of 400 to raise more than £100,000 is an achievement, and I can see why my hon. Friend would not like to go through the process again next year. I congratulate him, in his role as church warden, and the other members of the congregation on that remarkable achievement.

For the past 20 years, Government funding has been available to assist with the repair and maintenance of historic church buildings. Such funding is today channelled through English Heritage. During the past five years, English Heritage has provided grant funding of £61.4 million for repairs to churches and cathedrals, the vast majority of them Anglican. During the current financial year, English Heritage expects to make some 300 grant offers, at a total value of £13 million, for church and cathedral repair schemes. Some 80 per cent. of the grants will be for Anglican buildings. Normally, only churches listed grade 1 or grade 2-star are eligible, but all applications, including those for grade 2 churches, are considered on their merits. The criteria for the award of grant are the historic importance of the building, the urgency of the proposed repairs, and the need for financial support.

The national lottery has now firmly established itself as a further key instrument for securing the future of the ecclesiastical heritage. Already, the heritage lottery fund has made 124 grant awards, totalling £14.5 million, for schemes relating to religious buildings. I understand that 105 of those awards have been for Anglican churches. Unlike English Heritage grants, which are geared towards the maintenance and repair of the fabric of historic churches, lottery funding is able to support a much wider range of projects. For example, a considerable number of lottery awards have been made for the restoration of church monuments, organs and bells. A further important difference is that lottery funding can be offered for unlisted churches in conservation areas and redundant churches.

As the House may be aware, in October, the heritage lottery fund and English Heritage launched an important new joint scheme for funding repairs to churches in use. That will pool lottery and English Heritage resources to create one source of funding. English Heritage and the Heritage Lottery Fund have each set aside £10 million for the scheme during its first year. That will enable available resources to be deployed more effectively and to reach a wider range of church buildings, thereby ensuring that more local communities benefit from lottery grants.

The scheme offers a simplified one-stop application process and will allow English Heritage and the heritage lottery fund to deal with applications more efficiently and quickly. It will provide them with a clearer overall picture of the requirements of churches, thus allowing them to assess individual needs more accurately and to target grants more effectively, but I should emphasise that church organisations or congregations that do not wish to seek lottery funding on moral grounds will still be free to apply only for English Heritage support.

A further expression of the partnership between Church and state is the continued commitment on both sides to the support of the Churches Conservation Trust. The trust is devoted to the repair and maintenance of outstanding Anglican churches that are no longer required for pastoral purposes and for which no suitable alternative use can be found. There are currently more than 300 churches in the care of the trust. Since 1995, the trust has been fortunate to have my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) as its chairman.

The major financial supporter of the Churches Conservation Trust are the Government, who contribute 70 per cent. of the trust's costs, the Church Commissioners providing the remaining 30 per cent. Over the three years from 1994 to 1997, financial provision for the trust has totalled £10.3 million, of which £7.2 million has come from the Government and £3.1 million from the Church Commissioners. Funding for the period 1997 to 2000 has been provisionally agreed at £10.6 million, comprising £7.4 million from the Government and £3.2 million from the Church Commissioners.

The level of funding is intended to enable the trust to keep its churches in a decent state of repair and to allow it to take on a limited number of additional churches. If the trust did not exist, many of those outstanding historic churches would face neglect, damaging alterations or even demolition. As it is, the buildings are maintained in sound condition, remain a focus in their localities and are accessible to the public.

I will also mention the Government's support for the work of the Historic Chapels Trust. The trust was set up in 1993 to acquire outstanding non-Anglican religious buildings—Roman Catholic churches, nonconformist chapels, synagogues and so on—which are no longer needed for worship. In effect, the trust aims to perform for such buildings a similar role to that undertaken by the Churches Conservation Trust.

The establishment of the Historic Chapels Trust was aided by financial support from the Government. The trust is currently funded via English Heritage grant and through private sponsorship. My Department is at present considering an application from the trust for financial support from the heritage grant fund. So far, the trust has acquired six buildings and is negotiating to acquire eight more.

Looking ahead, I should draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that financial support will be available to the churches for the role that we anticipate that they will play in celebrating the new millennium. All the Christian churches have a potentially vital contribution to make in what is, at its heart, a year of religious significance—the 2,000th anniversary of the birth of Christ. The Government are liaising closely with all the churches on how the spiritual aspects of the millennium can be reflected in plans for marking the occasion. In preparation, many historic Anglican churches will benefit from grants worth more than £5 million approved by the Millennium Commission for restoring belfries and casting new bells, for a nationwide peal of church bells to ring in the new millennium.

My hon. Friend mentioned the recently published Church of England document "Developing the Partnership between Church and State over the Ecclesiastical Heritage". Let me say at once that the Government warmly welcome the document. As I have already said, the existing Church and state partnership has already achieved a great deal. However, we are ready to discuss new ways in which the partnership can be developed and strengthened. From what my hon. Friend said in his speech, he might like to use his fertile imagination and experience to suggest ways in which that might be done.

There is much in the Church's document with which we whole-heartedly agree. The financial difficulties and pressures currently facing the Church of England are well understood by the Government. I have to say, too, that there are also constraints on the state side. The continuing need to control public expenditure means that heritage spending programmes are likely to remain under pressure for the foreseeable future. None the less, the Government are ready to work with the Church in exploring other possible sources of funding for the ecclesiastical heritage—for example, from Europe. We are also willing to consider what steps can be taken to improve co-ordination between all the Government and non-Government agencies with a potential role.

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has already had discussions on the issues with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage and my noble Friend the Minister for Tourism. As the next step, officials in my Department will hold discussions with the General Synod to explore the issues raised in the document in detail, identify the constraints on each side and explore possible new options.

Without prejudice to the outcome of the discussions, it may be helpful if I make a couple of observations in response to some comments made in the Church's document. The first is the concern that the Government have gone back on their commitment to the additionality of lottery funding. The document urges that English Heritage funding should not be reduced to take account of the advent of the lottery. I can assure the House that the Government stand by their commitment to the additionality of lottery funding and that we therefore have no intention of reducing core funding programmes to take account of awards from the lottery.

That commitment does not mean that the Government can set aside the constraints on public expenditure to which I have already referred. None the less, I hope hon. Members will have found some encouragement in our recent decision to grant an additional £1.8 million to English Heritage in 1997-98, which means that funding for next year will be substantially maintained at this year's level. It is of course for English Heritage to decide how best to allocate the available resources across all its activities.

The second point relates to the claim—as my hon. Friend mentioned—that, in 1993, VAT on churches and cathedrals repairs cost the Church about £16 million, far more than it receives in English Heritage grants. The document calls for the Government to press the European Commission to add listed building repairs to the categories of services eligible for reduced rates of VAT at national discretion, as alterations already are. My hon. Friend will know that, as a tax matter, this is the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. While we have no particular reason to doubt the Church of England's £16 million figure on the amount of VAT paid, I have to say that the way VAT is collected does not allow Customs and Excise to calculate the amount of VAT paid on churches or on listed buildings.

Furthermore, the VAT directive that requires repairs to be taxed at the full 17.5 per cent. is about to be reviewed. Any decision on whether to increase the scope of the list of goods and services to which a reduced rate of VAT may be applied would be taken by the Finance Ministers of all member states. It is currently the UK Government's policy to have a single rate of VAT at 17.5 per cent., but to retain for the present the existing zero rates, which have been agreed with our EU partners.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving the House the opportunity to debate this important matter. I hope that hon. Members will have been reassured about the Government's continuing commitment to the preservation of our ecclesiastical heritage. We look forward to working closely with the Church of England and other denominations and faiths in pursuit of that objective.

East London and the City Health Authority

1.29 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): This debate should not be necessary. Earlier this year, we debated the circumstances of East London and the City district health authority, partly because of the closure of Bart's and the 30 per cent. reduction in the number of beds planned for the three east London boroughs: Hackney, Tower Hamlets and Newham. They are three of the neediest boroughs in the country, but they do not lack in human spirit and initiative.

The base problem involves capitation. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) wishes to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, and he may pursue that point further. The money allocated to the authority in order to purchase health facilities from the providers is tied to a national formula that is clearly inadequate. The situation has worsened in the past few years: we would have had £50 million more per year, but for an adjustment in the capitation formula that does not take account of the needs of people coming to the borough from other parts of the world, the age of the population and the health needs of the area. In the same period, I am told that Surrey received an increase of £30 million as a result of the same adjustment. That capitation formula must be altered again.

Recently, we have faced an even bigger, visible—if not financial—anomaly: the way in which psychiatric need is met. We all know about the scandalous difficulties in the mental health service. However, we forget that, when people go to court, are found incapable of pleading properly and are not sentenced, they pass from the responsibility of the Home Office to that of the health service. In my district, there are about 60 or 65 persons of that ilk or those who have been released from prison, upon whom the health service spends some £7 million. We believe that that funding should be provided centrally, as few health districts elsewhere carry that sort of load—I believe that it is only about half a dozen.

We aim at least to sustain health service delivery in the area. Despite claims in the Budget and the Prime Minister's comments in Prime Minister's questions yesterday, we cannot do so. On 2 December, I asked the Secretary of State for Health—who was boasting about increases in health service expenditure—about the situation in east London. He replied:

> "The authority also has bids for other funds, which are currently being considered".—[Official Report, 2 December 1996; Vol. 286, c. 686.]

We need those funds because we must sustain existing services with an £18 million shortfall in delivery. The authority has announced cuts of £40 million. We need that additional £18 million—or as much as the Government can supply through the bids. I received a written reply yesterday about the bids for health authorities, which are described as undergoing structural or strategic change. My health authority is undergoing structural change in respect of possible closures, to which I shall refer in a moment.

When Bart's closed, we were told that we would have a new hospital at Homerton. A few weeks ago, the authority published the option of closing Homerton or Newham general hospital—two major hospitals in east London. It was forced to dismiss that option as unfeasible, but it must still find the equivalent savings. Newham is experiencing difficulties because it maintains a huge accident and emergency facility—although I understand that it costs less per head of population than many similar facilities elsewhere. A and E needs must be met by relocating facilities and resources from elsewhere in the hospital.

We are facing extensive cuts. The authority has told general practitioners that they must be more careful about hospital admissions—it employs bureaucratic terms such as "gatekeeping" or "readjustment of entry". GPs have been told that out-patients will not be seen until after April 1997 and that waiting times may increase to 18 months. There will be a reduction in provider contracts of 7,500 bed days, which means less provision to meet consistently growing needs.

There are 40 vacancies among the estimated 400 GP posts in the area. GPs are finding the load difficult to bear and thus are less enthusiastic about their perceived role. Why should they stay in east London, when the prevailing conditions do not allow them to do their jobs as professionals? As a result of the cuts, GPs are being asked to recommend fewer people for admission to hospital. They are then required to provide more at-home care when people are released from hospital, under a policy of "fewer in and quicker out". At the same time as they are providing increased care on the ground, they are told to expect redundancies among practice nursing staff and general domiciliary services. Local authority social services also have difficulty meeting existing need.

The need is so great that the local medical committee—a statutory body—took the unusual step of writing to the Secretary of State. It was not alone: it was joined by three voluntary borough forums of general practitioners, who work co-operatively together and play an essential part in the structure. Some 200 signed the letter that was sent to the Secretary of State on 5 November. As of yesterday, I understand that they have received no reply or acknowledgment of the letter. That is astonishing—it may be the result of delayering in the civil service; I do not know. It is all the more remarkable because, having received no reply, the group then sent a letter to The Times outlining the problems that they face, which was published on 10 December, but they still received no reply.

I do not know whether officers of the Department of Health read The Times or whether the Minister has been briefed about the matter—perhaps he will tell us today when he replies to the debate. In addition, BBC South-East broadcast a 30-minute television programme on 28 November highlighting the plight of the people of east London and the ineffective funding of their health services. I presume that the Department of Health knows about that.

Not only are the professionals in difficulty, but there is pressure on the voluntary organisations. In east London—like everywhere else—there is great concern for those who are ill, who need constant care and who may turn to hostels or to similar organisations to meet their needs. The Newham Care and Repair service, which allows people to be discharged from hospital and returned to their home sooner than might occur otherwise, is to be cut. The elderly derive particular benefit from the service, as their conditions often necessitate structural adjustments in the home and they may require daily care and visits. It is proposed to cut that service—although decisions are still up in the air in view of the £18 million shortfall.

The organisation Turning Point is located in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore)—he may mention it if he catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. An imaginative scheme, Breaking Ground, deals with 15 mentally retarded people with severe health needs. They literally break ground and are recuperated through horticultural activities.

I have mentioned the problem of those who are found incapable of pleading in court. I highlight the terrible instance of a person who was discharged prematurely from Neasden hospital in Hertfordshire—which has its own problems—visited a club run by the borough and murdered one of my constituents. The Laudat Bennett case is well known, but has not been solved properly. I believe that the circumstances that led to the incident are still cause for concern, although increased funding has been provided for psychiatry in the borough.

We face all those difficulties in an area that demonstrably needs more than other areas. I do not think that the Secretary of State understands the effects of the capitation system and the way in which the market works. Each so-called profit centre naturally seeks to make its own economies without knowing the human knock-on effects. Its work is always predicated on contracts, which are sometimes not fulfilled for the future. The Royal London hospital has problems: it usually makes capital gains, but it cannot be sure of the plans.

The biggest problem of all is closures. It is clear from the documents that have been produced by East London and the City health authority that it is considering closing not Newham or Homerton hospital, but St. Andrew's hospital in Bromley-by-Bow. It is an old building—it is an old workhouse—which has 150 beds and serves mainly Newham. The staff are renowned in the area for their teamwork. They do a great job. The hospital provides ancillary services. By accountants' calculations, it could save so many million pounds if it were run down.

There are long-term plans for the replacement of the facilities at St. Andrew's by facilities at Newham general hospital, which has 40 fewer beds. Those plans depend on the private finance initiative, which is not coming along at all fast. The premature rundown of St. Andrew's in Bromley-by-Bow would be disastrous, and would put pressure on the other hospitals in the area. Beds would be removed and the services provided by the laboratories reduced. The corporate nature of the staff is important: they tend to be long-serving because of the type of surgery that they undertake. They work in difficult conditions, but they are greatly appreciated by the people of Newham.

I want to put several questions to the Minister. Did he receive the letter from GPs? Why did he not reply? Are the facts that it contains not correct? As far as I know, they are. Did he not see their letter in The Times? Did he not hear about the half-hour television broadcast that dealt with the problems in east London? How much of the Government's money, which is out for bidding—the complicated document has been placed in the Library—will be available for application by East London and the City health authority? I am told that some of the money that it hopes to obtain has already been included in its calculations: it has been taken into account, even allowing for the £18 million that the authority has to find. We must know the answer to that question before the coming financial year, in order to make proper plans.

It would be a scandal if people were given long-term notice—which they are now, particularly in the voluntary sector. There are fears throughout the health service staff. The Minister knows that one of the greatest assets of our great health service—or what was once a great health service—is the dedication of the staff. They are being asked to do more and more with less and less. Is that right? The Prime Minister says that the health service is getting more and more, but I do not believe it.

Dissembling has become a d-word in the House, although I would not go as far as to accuse the Government of dissembling in this instance. We need to know—through the loophole of finance—that we shall receive a good part of that £18 million to sustain our services. We are told that the health service is expanding, but how can it be when we have also been told to expect vicious cuts? That is debilitating, and is beginning to destroy a health service of which this country has been proud.

It is because of the initiative of general practitioners and others that we have managed to obtain a response from the people in the service. We await the Government's reply. They are responsible to the electors, who pay for the service that we are all proud of and wish to sustain.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on raising this vital subject. As the finances of East London and the City health authority have been spinning out of control, a kind of madness has set in. Hospital closures are still proposed in the medium term. Recently, the chief executive of ELCHA, Peter Coe, said publicly on the radio that no decisions on the closures could be taken before the general election. Thank God for that.

The absurd people who run the most despised bureaucracy in the national health service have at last realised that there are limits to their bizarre betrayal of local people. I am told privately that their thinking is as follows. The Royal London hospital cannot be closed—I certainly do not want it to close—because the Government are committed to spending £300 million on a new hospital there, even if that distorts local finances for decades to come.

In the medium term, the authority wants to close either Homerton or Newham hospital, but not both. It is a satanic choice: Newham people can die, or Hackney people can die—take your pick. Demographically, the authority would prefer to save Newham hospital, with a functioning accident and emergency unit, but Newham has many problems—so I am told—and Homerton is still new and being built, so its closure would be political dynamite.

That is not the end of the savage irrationality. East London and the City health authority has published a list of cuts in community and hospital care. From Hoxton Health to Lorne house, from counselling for Asian women on health to help for Turkish and Kurdish communities, from City and Hackney MIND to the Hackney bereavement service, from Age Concern Hackney to the Jewish care services for frail older people, cuts are being made.

General practitioners are up in arms. Consultants are blinking in disbelief, voluntary organisations are angry, and the rest of us are stunned. We wait with interest to see whether the Minister is more than complacent today.

1.45 pm

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North–East): I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on securing this important debate.

East London health services have the most overstretched staff, who work in the shabbiest conditions and deal with the highest levels of ill health in the country. It is scandalous that they struggle in the 1990s in decrepit conditions that were obsolete in the 1970s. Whatever measurement we use, Hackney, Tower Hamlets and Newham have the highest concentration of health and social problems in the country.

At a time when the Government tell us that they are substantially increasing the resources for the health service, how is it that in east London we are facing the appalling cuts that my hon. Friends described? A couple of years ago, the Government removed the needs weighting for the 24 per cent. of funds in the capitation formula that relate to community health services. At first sight, that may appear to be an obscure technical adjustment, but its consequences for east London have been catastrophic, and have culminated in this crisis.

In the summer of last year, an article in the Health Service Journal presented the top 10 losers from that adjustment to the formula developed at York university and introduced by the Department of Health. East London suffered the largest cash loss to its target—£13.2 million. The other biggest losers were Manchester, Liverpool, Sunderland, Barnsley, North Durham, St. Helen's and Knowsley, South of Tyne, Tees and Newcastle.

In whose interest did the Government decide that they needed to make the adjustment? Which areas have such a pressing case for help that it was necessary to cut the amount for east London, Sunderland, Middlesbrough and Knowsley? The article spelled it out. The biggest gainer of all, with more than a 5 per cent. increase, was mid-Surrey. The second biggest gainer in the entire country was north-west Surrey. The third biggest was south-west Surrey, and the fourth was east Surrey. Who was the Secretary of State for Health while all that chicanery was going on? It was none other than the right hon. Member for South–West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley).

The Government have cynically siphoned funds away from areas where they are most needed, to spend them in areas where they think that they can buy the most votes. The health needs of Britain have lost out to the vote needs of the Tory party. The Tory party has concluded that it can get away with gerrymandering the health funding formula. That is why we are now facing this crisis. The figures for next year provide us with no comfort at all.

I take no pleasure in recounting those facts, but I make no apology for being angry about the crisis. As I left home in East Ham this morning, my next-door neighbour told me of the problems that she was having getting the treatment that she needs at our local hospital. She said, "I do not blame the doctors," and nor do I. I do not even blame the administrators appointed by the Government to run the service: in this instance, I think that they are doing their best. The fault lies fairly and squarely with the Conservative party, and the Government's record on health in the hardest-pressed parts of the country is a disgrace.

Across east London, partnerships between local authorities, businesses and Government are bearing fruit and generating new optimism. In health, partnership has barely started, and we are still stuck with the problems of the 1970s. With these huge funding cuts, we are poised to take a huge leap backwards.

The London Docklands development corporation—itself as proud a creature of this Government as any—has at times been in despair at the impossibility of making progress in the health service in east London. What is the Government's response? Their response is to make £18 million-worth of cuts, which constitutes the axing of 5 per cent. of the total budget. I appeal to the Minister to take a close look at the problems in east London, and to see whether, even now, there is some way of averting the catastrophe that is looming.

1.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on his success in securing the debate, and am pleased to be able to respond. I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's persistent and pertinent questioning of my hon. Friend the Minister for Health and me over the past few months on issues relating to the problems that we are discussing; I also acknowledge the interests of the hon. Members for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) and for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms), both of whom are obviously sincerely concerned about the issues.

East London and the City health authority, the local health authority of the hon. Member for Newham, South, is one of the largest health authorities in London, with a population of about 600,000. Like every health authority, it is responsible for studying the health needs of the local population, and ensuring the availability and provision of appropriate care and treatment for local residents.

Health authorities' allocations for 1997-98 were recently announced. East London and the City will receive an integrated allocation of £365.4 million—more money than ever before, and a real-terms increase of £8.7 million, or nearly 2.5 per cent., on its funding this year. That is the 11th highest percentage increase awarded to the 100 health authorities in England; I stress that in response to the points made by the hon. Member for Newham, North-East.

As a student of these matters, the hon. Member for Newham, South will know that what we mean by "integrated allocation" is the general allocation of £348 million, together with other allocations influenced by the weighted capitation formula. On top of all that, the authority will receive £25.6 million in non-formula-based moneys for services such as long-term care. After adjustments, that gives the authority a total cash budget of nearly £390 million for 1997-98. Furthermore, central funding is available for national priorities. The health authority is bidding for those funds, and therefore may well have more to spend next year. That means that East London and the City health authority will have at least £650 for each of its residents to spend on health care next year.

Ms Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): If what the Minister is saying is correct, does he not agree that the money must be being misspent? Speech therapy will now be refused to 375 children between the ages of five and 11, and Moorfields hospital is turning away patients from east London who want eye operations and appointments, because of the reduced funding of the contract for east London and the City health authority. Where is all the extra money going?

Mr. Horam: The extra money is going into the provision of extra services in some areas. If the hon. Lady wishes to take up the question of precisely where there may be some underfunding, that is a matter for the health authority, and I am sure that she will take it up with the authority.

How the health authority uses the extra money is a matter for it to determine, having regard to all local needs, circumstances and views. I remind the hon. Member for Newham, South not only that more money is going to East London and the City and other health authorities this year than ever before, but that, with the merger of district health authorities and family health service authorities from the beginning of April, and with ever-increasing efficiency, more money on top of that is available for health services and direct patient care.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, East London and the City's population is ethnically diverse and characteristic of London's densely populated inner-city areas, and it makes much of that. In response to the point made so forcefully—but, in my view, mistakenly—by the hon. Member for Newham, North-East, let me say that our allocation policy is to target resources where the need for health care services is greatest. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Newham, South must listen to what I am saying. Hospital and community health service funding is largely based on a national formula worked out on the basis of the size of the local population, weighted to take account of factors such as the number of very young or very old people and the degree of social deprivation that exists. It also takes account of market forces such as the higher costs of staff, buildings and land in the south-east.

Next year, for the first time, the formula includes a specific needs index for community health services—the hon. Gentleman referred to that—bringing 86 per cent. of the national allocation within the ambit of the formula. That will benefit the health authorities in inner-city areas such as east London.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not. I have only five minutes left in which to respond to at least four hon. Members.

Both the changes that have been made to the formula for next year—the introduction of interim needs weighting for community health services, and the refinement of the market forces adjustment—will improve the health authority's weighted-capitation position. That not only means more funds for the authority next year; it means that the authority is no longer above its weighted-capitation position. It is no longer what we call a capitation loser, and can look forward to a larger share of additional health resources over the next few years. As the hon. Gentleman knows, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has committed himself to real-terms increases in resources year after year when we are re-elected for the next Parliament.

Before I say more about funding or service planning for next year, let me say something about the health authority's position this year, and the ability of the service to cope for the remainder of the financial year. The authority's initial allocation for the current year was £337 million—£1.63 million more in real terms than in 1995-96. Its forecast at the end of the second financial quarter was that it would end the year with a £13.7 million deficit. That forecast was based on expenditure and trends up to that time; I stress that it is not the position in which the authority is likely to find itself at the end of the year. That is the whole point of forecasts: as part of a proper regime of good financial management and control, they allow action to be taken in good time to keep within the financial balance for the year as a whole.

The health authority has indeed taken action based on its analysis of local circumstances, to ensure that good-quality services continue to be available, and that a sound financial outturn is achieved. In the autumn it bid for, and has received, additional non-recurring funds of £6 million to support strategic change. That is a lump of money that is already going in this year, in addition to the money which—as the hon. Gentleman said—it has bid for next year. That £6 million, together with other measures, means that the authority's residual deficit is now estimated at £2.3 million, or just 0.7 per cent. of its allocation. It is for the authority to manage its affairs for the rest of the year to meet its financial position. The situation certainly does not suggest that local people should be in any way concerned about the continued availability of good-quality services; nor does it suggest a service close to collapse, as some commentators have tried to imply.

What about next year? First, let me say that—as I think the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge—East London and the City health authority has been very open with the local community in planning for the future. Given that health care resources can never be infinite and that health authorities must prioritise among competing demands, it is only right for them to outline some of the difficult choices that they must make as purchasers, and to involve the local community in the making of those choices.

In planning for next year, the health authority set up three task groups, which were charged with looking at acute, mental health and primary and community care services. The process began with an exercise to quantify the implications of continuing with the existing health strategy; that is where the projected deficit of £18 million for next year comes from.

Essentially, we are talking about a re-balancing process. We are looking at national and local priorities, and at the balance between, for example, acute services on the one hand and mental health services on the other. That is how the funding will be rearranged, with the aim of meeting what are regarded as priorities. In addition, the health authority is bidding against the funds that we have made available for next year for the development of services in priority areas. I cannot yet say how much will be allocated, but it will include money for community care, adult intensive care and mental health services, which are a particular problem in that part of the world. I take the hon. Gentleman's point: we shall have to make a decision on that before the end of the year.

I shall certainly look into what the hon. Gentleman said about the letter that was sent to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—

Mr. Spearing: From the 200 doctors.

Mr. Horam: That letter was sent at the end of November, and I saw the letter in The Times. Let me tell the hon. Gentleman, however, that far from more and more being got from less and less, in East London and the City more and more is being got from more and more.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Drugs (Clubs and Raves)

1. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to protect young people from drugs when attending clubs and raves in Scotland. [8131]

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): We have given councils the powers to control or close down raves for the purpose of safeguarding young people attending events in licensed premises.

Mr. Rathbone: That is welcome news because there are great dangers for young people at these dance parties, as is proven by recent research results which show that the real danger of Ecstasy is not appreciated by many young people who are tempted to take it. Has my hon. Friend considered issuing either the guidelines that have been produced by the London drug policy forum in a document called "Dance Till Dawn Safely" or replicating such guidelines for use by clubs in Scotland?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall certainly consider that. My hon. Friend is correct: there is evidence of an association between the use of Ecstasy and substantial liver damage. It is a class A drug which carries penalties of up to seven years for possession, and life for trafficking. We have set up a new national drugs helpline to provide free confidential advice, support and referrals 24 hours a day to drug misusers, their families and friends, and to supply information for anybody who is concerned about drugs.

Government Expenditure and Tax Revenues

2. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the difference between total Government expenditure in Scotland and tax revenues raised in Scotland, expressed as a proportion of Scottish gross domestic product; and if he will make a statement. [8132]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Fourteen per cent.

Mr. Arnold: Does not that rather generous figure emphasise the good sense of our United Kingdom Government, and would not that generosity be put in danger by Labour's devolution plans? Hypothetically, if those devolution plans were put into effect, how would I as an English Member explain to my constituents why, despite that money going to Scotland, Scottish hon. Members could take decisions on issues in my constituency such as health, education and hospitals, although I would not have a similar say over the spending of United Kingdom resources in Scotland?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend will forgive me for not agreeing with his use of the word "generous". As I have just completed public expenditure negotiations with the Treasury, my use of that word might be somewhat wrong. On the overall position, my hon. Friend is right to point out what a good deal Scotland gets from the Union and how our public services and our standard of living would be threatened and destroyed by the policies of the opposition parties either to establish a tax-raising Parliament or to obtain independence—and, of course, the latter would follow from the former.

Mr. Maxton: On Monday, what amount of tax revenue was used to pay for the cost of an RAF aeroplane to fly the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland from Inverness to London? Is the Secretary of State prepared to tell the House exactly how much such journeys cost the Scottish Office?

Mr. Forsyth: The cost of the smallest RAF aeroplane, which is what we used, so we could not accommodate the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends on board—although I would have been happy to strap the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) to the aircraft's wing after his behaviour at the Highlands and Islands Convention—is about £700 per flying hour.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the high revenue level indicates the Scottish economy's success? Is not that confirmed by today's announcement of a dramatic drop in unemployment in Scotland, which shows how well the Scottish economy is going under the Government?

Mr. Forsyth: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. Scotland's economy is booming. We have record inward investment. Today, we again have excellent unemployment figures. It is a picture of an economy that has been transformed as a result of the Government's policies, which have been opposed by Opposition Members. All of it would be put at risk by a tartan-tax-raising Scottish Parliament.

Mr. George Robertson: Will the Secretary of State confirm his already public statement that the Scottish Office budget will be reduced by £880 million in real terms in the next three years? What will that mean for public health in Scotland and our ability to control crises such as E. coli bacteria and the spread of salmonella in Scotland? What if Professor Pennington's expert group suggests, as it should, that there should be an independent food standards agency? Will that be vetoed, like his last research project, on the ground that there is not enough money for it? When will the Government stop covering up their conduct in the E. coli crisis by blaming everyone but Ministers of the Crown? Will the Secretary of State now belatedly tell the House and the country what the role of Ministers was at the beginning of the E. coli crisis in Lanarkshire?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is pathetic. We have had two statements to the House on that matter. I wish that he would stop attacking the conduct of North Lanarkshire council, a Labour authority, which, as he well knows, has been and is responsible, under the Food Safety Act 1990, which had all-party support in the House, for environmental health services.

When we win the election, Scotland's health service will benefit from our pledge to increase spending year on year in real terms throughout the whole of the next Parliament, a promise that the hon. Gentleman is not allowed to make and cannot make because he has already made promises in secret to his friends in local government.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, relative to the Scottish budget and expenditure, if we were ever to have a Parliament in Edinburgh that decided on matters such as health, Scottish Members could not raise those issues, as the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has just done, because they would be part-time and unable to ask questions about Scottish matters—and should be paid part-time wages?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) hopes to have many Labour Members coming down from Scotland, whose job would be not to represent Scotland's interests, but to impose socialism on England. That unstable position would wreck his party's proposals, as it has wrecked every previous home rule proposal, but my hon. Friend makes the important point that Scotland's budget would still be determined here at Westminster, where Scotland's voice would be diminished, as hon. Members on the Liberal Benches acknowledge, through the loss of the office of Secretary of State for Scotland in Cabinet. With a tax-raising Parliament in Edinburgh, it is difficult to see how our present advantageous position would be maintained. The hon. Member for Hamilton and his colleagues are putting their socialist interests ahead of the interests of people who depend on education, health, social work and all our other caring services in Scotland. We will expose that in the forthcoming election campaign.

Skye Bridge Tolls

3. Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of the Skye bridge tolls upon the economy of the highlands and western isles; and if he will make a statement. [8133]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Kynoch): All our research shows it has been an enormous success.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the Minister acknowledge that there is recognition throughout the highlands and islands that this vexed issue will probably be resolved only with the outcome of the general election? The Scottish Liberal Democrats will be campaigning on a manifesto commitment to abolish the tolls. In the interim, given the Secretary of State's commitment on Monday at the Highlands and Islands Convention that the economics of all this will be examined, will he take account of the evidence that has been provided by the joint consultants report to the Highland council and Skye and Lochalsh Enterprise, which showed that the number of heavy goods vehicles and coaches using the bridge has declined by no less than 25 per cent. since it opened? That is having a drastic economic impact on Skye and the Western Isles. I hope that we can have the Minister's commitment that that will be taken into account in the pre-election assessment that is to take place.

Mr. Kynoch: I should have hoped that the hon. Gentleman would have recognised what a success the bridge has been for Skye. The figures for the first year, compared with those for the last year of the ferry, show a 16 per cent. increase in throughput. Skye has benefited from the bridge, as has the Mallaig ferry. I should have hoped that he would recognise that the bridge has brought significant benefits to his constituents in Skye.

It was the idea of the Highland regional council that the bridge should be constructed. If tolls were to be removed, that would put a burden on other areas of local authority expenditure. I challenge the hon. Gentleman: if he is willing to put such a pledge in his election manifesto, where would he cut services in the highlands to pay for it?

Mr. Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree that the cuts might not be in the highlands? If the tolls were paid for by the Scottish Office, the money might come from cuts in programmes that would affect my constituents in Eastwood. Will my hon. Friend send a firm message to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) and his campaigners that, if that is a possibility, it is not on?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend has put his finger on it. The proposals from the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats—[Interruption.] Scottish National party members seem to be indicating that they have the same policies. I am not aware of that party vigorously supporting a tax-raising Parliament other than seeing it as a stepping stone to full independence.

If the Opposition's policy of a tax-raising Parliament came about, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) would be absolutely right. If the cost had to be funded from the Scottish Office, who knows where it might be taken from. It could be taken from Eastwood—it could even be Hamilton. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) might have to face the stark reality of telling his constituents how he would fund something—for a change.

Mr. Macdonald: Can the Minister name any other bridge in Britain that is part of the public highway but is not funded, at least in part, out of public taxation? How can he justify using the most remote communities in Britain as the victims of this unique experiment in privatisation?

Mr. Kynoch: I should have hoped that the hon. Gentleman would recognise that, originally, the people of Skye and the tourists visiting Skye had to use a ferry to get there. The tolls charged on the new bridge are significantly less than the ferry fares.

Mr. Macdonald: They are not.

Mr. Kynoch: When one looks at the published fares, even the discount fares, one can see that the tolls are significantly less. Only large buses benefited from a non-seasonal discount. Now, across the board, there are low season discounts on tolls, some of which are significantly less than the fares in the last year of the ferry's operation. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that the bridge has brought about a 16 per cent. increase in throughput for the benefit of the people of Skye.

Mr. John Marshall: The question refers in part to the economy of the highlands and the western isles. Does my hon. Friend agree that the whisky industry is important to that area? Will he congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on being the first Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce duty on whisky in two consecutive Budgets, and welcome the fact that the Japanese are reducing their discrimination against Scotch? The people of Scotland will drink a toast and a wee dram to the Chancellor—even if mean-minded Opposition Members will not.

Mr. Kynoch: I am glad that my hon. Friend realises the great benefits that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has brought to the whisky industry and—as we were talking about the Skye bridge—to the people of Skye. The bridge makes it that much easier to transport product backwards and forwards between Skye and the mainland, and I am sure that distilleries on Skye will benefit significantly from that improved access.

In the past few years, on average, the ferry has not operated—because of bad weather or maintenance—for approximately 80 hours a year, whereas the bridge, in its first year of operation, was closed for only one hour. I argue not only that my right hon. and learned Friend has brought benefits through his whisky tax reduction—which we all welcome—but that the bridge has enabled the people of Skye to live in very much better spirits than they might have with the ferry.

Mrs. Liddell: Will the Minister explain to the House how many crossings of the Skye bridge could be made for the cost of hiring one RAF jet from Inverness to London? Is that an example of Tory transport policy for the highlands—one service for the privileged, and another for the rest?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Lady demeans herself by couching a question on the highlands in such terms. It is all about a diversionary tactic by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who spent the first 40 minutes of the first meeting of the Highlands and Islands Convention arguing about procedures.

I think that all those who were present at that meeting agree that, after those first 40 minutes, it was very positive and constructive. We discussed many serious subjects, which was of benefit to the highlands and enabled all the bodies involved in the highlands to get together to co-ordinate their views. We also produced an agenda of topics that future meetings will discuss. Liberal Democrat Members seem to be nodding in agreement. I should think that they would welcome an opportunity to discuss such matters in a sensible forum, without the petty party politics and point-scoring attempted by the hon. Lady.

Uncollected Local Authority Taxes

4. Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding the level of uncollected local authority taxes in Scotland. [8134]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There is £721 million of uncollected local authority taxes in Scotland.

Sir Irvine Patnick: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. That is a lot of money. Which is the worst offending council? What would be the effect in that and other cities in Scotland if the council collected its dues and demands—in other words, carried out its fiduciary duty?

Mr. Forsyth: On uncollected council tax, the worst offenders are Glasgow, Dundee, Edinburgh and Aberdeen. Glasgow has the largest amount of uncollected council tax. Currently, band D council tax payers in Glasgow have to pay £807. If all the money were collected, however, they would receive a cheque for £315 from the council.

Mr. McAvoy: Does the Secretary of State accept that the £14 billion cost of the poll tax to the British public was due largely to his support for its introduction in Scotland? When will he have the guts and the honesty to confess his share of guilt in imposing that £14 billion tax on the British people? Does he realise the extent to which the people of Scotland regard his cavalier attitude to public spending, which he showed by taking that aircraft on Monday night, as a pathetic spectacle? He might say that the incident was petty, small or minor, but it showed that he has a double standard when it comes to spending public money in Scotland.

Mr. Forsyth: I think that we can take that as a commitment, on behalf of the Labour party, that—if Labour is ever in government—Labour Members will not make any use of RAF jets. I look forward to hearing the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) make that commitment.

Mr. McAvoy: Answer my question.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman wants an answer on the poll tax, but he obviously does not like the answer he has had on the RAF. On his question on the poll tax, the hon. Gentleman might like to note that Labour councils in Scotland are showing an increasingly poor record of collecting council tax. Consequently, council tax payers who pay their council tax are having to pay more. That is what Labour is like in local government, and it would be the same in central Government. If it were ever elected to office, there would be higher taxes and poorer standards in collection and in administering the law. That has been Labour's record in local government, and that is its record in Scotland.

Inward Investment

5. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the major inward investment projects in Scotland in the last six months. [8135]

Mr. Kynoch: We have attracted 45 inward investment projects to Scotland over the past six months. It would be impossible to list them all, but I shall mention some. They include projects by: Allied Precision, Appryl, Bermo, CWW Logistics, Hyundai, IBM, Instrument Specialities, Level Nine, Lite-On Technology, PM Support Services, Polaroid, Quintiles, Roche, Rohr, Smart Modular Technologies and Techdrill.

Lady Olga Maitland: I congratulate my hon. Friend on a massive vote of confidence in the Conservatives' management of Scotland. Does he agree that it would be a cruel trick to follow Labour's proposals to saddle such successful industry with a tartan tax, a social chapter and a minimum wage? Those measures would destroy jobs and deter future investment. Surely the people of Scotland will vote the right way and ensure that Labour never has a chance there or in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is right. We have been successful with inward investment because investors recognise the possibility of locating in Scotland and being competitive in world markets. The seasonally adjusted unemployment figures for Scotland released this morning show a reduction of 7,900 people, down to 7.4 per cent. That has happened because Scottish business is competitive.

Saddling Scottish business with increased taxation, through the tartan tax or the trade tax—taking the uniform business rate away and giving control back to Labour local authorities that appear intent on putting costs up—would be counter-productive. Those measures, together with the social chapter and the minimum wage, would be disastrous for Scottish companies. If we want unemployment to continue falling and inward investment to continue flowing into the country, we must provide the right economic conditions for business to succeed. Only this Government can provide that.

Mr. Dalyell: How much taxpayers' money went on those 45 projects?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman is aware that the figures for the regional selective assistance offered to each project are given in the Edinburgh Gazette the quarter after the grant is taken up. The figures are not disclosed at the time of granting, because projects put forward for regional selective assistance have commercial sensitivity. It would be wrong to disclose—

Mr. Connarty: The Minister obviously does not know.

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) is prattling from a sedentary position about my not—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) has been constantly prattling from a sedentary position since we started. If he expects to be called to put a question, he might contain himself now.

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman's prattling from a sedentary position shows his ignorance about how inward investment is attracted to Scotland and how jobs are created in Scotland. If he spent a little more time considering his party's policies, he might get a little further in succeeding in keeping people in Scotland and keeping investment flowing in.

Mr. Gallie: I welcome the fall in unemployment in Scotland—from 7.8 per cent. to 7.4 per cent.—that has been announced today. What proportion of that fall could be attributed to inward investment, and how much to the uniform business rate and its beneficial effects on small businesses? Does my hon. Friend agree that changing the uniform business rate—as the Labour party wants—would be a disaster for those who want to be employed in Scotland?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is right to concentrate on the uniform business rate, because businesses, particularly small businesses, in Scotland have been crying out for it and are pleased to see it. They now have a level playing field throughout Scotland and England.

The Opposition's policy of returning the uniform business rate to local government control and linking it to an increase in band D council tax—the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) does not seem to have decided on the speed with which he will implement it should he ever be able to do so—would have increased business rates for small businesses in Glasgow by 20 per cent. last year. I doubt whether such a policy is good for unemployment. Small businesses would suffer severely under the Labour party's policies.

Mr. Kirkwood: I acknowledge that Locate in Scotland has been very successful in the past six months or so, but does the Minister accept that there is concern that the financial arrangements that it has put in place to achieve that success have been at the expense of some of the other budgets available to local enterprise companies? Will he give an assurance that there will be no top slicing, which would result in other parts of Scotland paying the price for the recipients of Locate in Scotland's excellent work?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman knows that regional selective assistance, for example, is equally available to indigenous companies. He has drawn the situation in the borders to my attention on numerous occasions. As he knows, I visited the borders in August and talked to Borders Enterprise, which will be putting its case to Scottish Enterprise. Scottish Enterprise is responsible for looking after inward investment and, more important, indigenous companies.

Mr. McFall: The Government have our support in attracting inward investment. The Minister knows that neither added value nor technology ventures have been very successful. What is he doing to convert inward investment into indigenous growth in Scotland? He will be aware that only 21 per cent. of the supplies of inward investors are secured in Scotland. If that figure rose by just 5 per cent., we could produce a Chungwha every year, creating 2,000 jobs. What are the Government doing in those two crucial areas?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman has double standards. I recognise his point about attracting research and development—he should welcome the fact that some inward investors are moving research and development activities into Scotland, and we shall obviously try for more—but the Opposition's taxation proposals would be far more damaging to the prospects of a Chungwha coming to the country. Given his party's taxation regime, it is utter folly for him to talk about getting a Chungwha every year.

Local Authority Completions

6. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many local authority new dwellings were completed in 1995. [8137]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): Just under 400.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does the Minister realise that, in Glasgow alone, the number of homeless applicants on the waiting list is more than 2,000? Is not that just one of the many scandalous aspects of the Government's housing policy? Does he agree with today's leader in The Herald in Glasgow, which describes our housing system as rotten to the core and in urgent need of reform?

Mr. Robertson: I agree that our housing system is in urgent need of reform. That is why I have spent the past year and a half encouraging local authorities, such as the one in her constituency, to remove themselves from being direct providers of housing and to transfer their housing stock to housing associations and housing companies.

I hope that the hon. Lady's council, like all others in Scotland, will address the number of vacant properties they have, which amount to 2.5 per cent. of Scotland's entire council housing stock.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Does the Minister accept that the problem of homelessness is not confined to urban areas? Rural homelessness is an increasing problem. The former Dunfermline, Kirkcaldy and North East Fife district council sold 40 per cent. of its local authority stock and performed the best in Scotland, yet it was not allowed to apply the proceeds from that sale to the problem of homelessness in its area. Why will the Government not adopt a much more flexible approach to the use of council house sales receipts?

Mr. Robertson: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that £4 billion-worth of housing debt has to be repaid? That has gone up by 6 per cent. in the past year alone. If he and his hon. Friends are not willing to protect council tenants, I assure him that we most definitely are.

Mr. Chisholm: Does the Minister accept that the dreadful new build figure that he gave will be even worse next year with the 30 per cent. cut in council housing budgets and that the number of housing association starts next year will be slashed from 4,000 to 1,500 due to the 25 per cent. cut in their budgets? Does he realise that renovation of cold, damp houses will be similarly curtailed, at great cost to people's health and NHS budgets? How can the Government seriously claim that they make health a priority when they promote ill health in that way and waste more and more money each year on NHS bureaucracy, as today's annual health statistics make abundantly clear?

Mr. Robertson: Despite all the rumblings and mutterings from Opposition spokesmen on housing since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made his statement, no one has ever said that, if Labour were in our position, it would not require local authorities to make the debt repayments that we require. Perhaps one of them would like to indicate, by nodding or shaking his head, whether Labour would go along with that policy.

As always on such matters, they see no evil, hear no evil and speak no evil; they will not say anything at all. The Opposition criticise us for doing something, but they will not even say whether they would go along with it or cancel it. I hope that every council tenant in Scotland appreciates the fact that, although the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm) comes to the Dispatch Box and says one thing, he apparently has not a clue what he would do if he were ever given the privilege of being a Minister.

Scottish Homes

7. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about the sale of Scottish Homes housing stock. [8138]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: My right hon. Friend has received seven letters in the past three months, two of which were from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Canavan: If the Government really want to promote diversity of choice for tenants, why was Falkirk council disqualified from submitting a bid in the Falkirk area, and the Link housing association bid excluded on the grounds that it did not meet the benchmark valuation, although there had been no prior stipulation that would lead to exclusion? As a result, for some housing estates the only bid being considered is that by Paragon, which is in an advantageous position, with access to Scottish Homes funding, staff and inside information. When there is only one name on the ballot paper, is not democracy reduced to a farce?

Mr. Robertson: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman. In view of the nonsense that we have just heard from the Opposition Front Bench, surely he is not asking us to go ahead with stock transfers that do not give value for money. That was the basis on which the other bidders were ruled out, and each of them has had the chance to rebid. Does the hon. Gentleman genuinely think that we should go to the National Audit Office and say that we will accept any bid, regardless of value for money? The Paragon housing association has no greater access to information than any of the other bidders, as the hon. Gentleman knows full well.

Mr. Gallie: Is my hon. Friend aware that a recent survey revealed that 80 per cent. of people in Scotland say that they want to own their own homes? Can he confirm that since 1979, when 35 per cent. of homes were in private ownership, we have achieved 58 per cent. ownership, and that we are well on the way to achieving recognition by the people of Scotland of the fact that we are meeting their aspirations?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right. The significant increase in home ownership during the Government's 18 years in office, from eastern European levels to almost 60 per cent., is a tremendous credit to the people of Scotland. That great achievement was fought for in the teeth of opposition by the Labour party both in the House and in town halls and council chambers throughout Scotland. To its eternal shame, Labour fought to refuse our people the right to buy and own their own homes.

Local Government Finance

8. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received concerning the 1997–98 financial settlement for Scottish local government. [8139]

Mr. Kynoch: Representations were received from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and a number of individual councils and other bodies prior to the announcement of the 1997-98 local government finance settlement.

Mr. McAllion: Does the Minister accept that within that settlement there is a savage 30 per cent. cut in spending on council housing in Scotland at a time when one in four of Scotland's children lives in housing which suffers from dampness, condensation and mould? When there are 7,000 excess deaths in Scotland every year, why are the Government cutting the spending that would keep people's homes warm and dry? Do the Government not understand that cuts in the housing programme increase ill health and thus add to the burdens on an already overstretched national health service?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman is great at knocking our proposals for local government in the coming year, but he does not say from where he would take the extra funding if he had the opportunity to decide. Last year he was good enough to tell us that he would take it from the health service. This year he was tempted into saying that he would take it from law and order. We regard health and law and order as priorities, and we believe that local government must get its house in order and start making itself efficient. The settlement that we have given it this year is more than reasonable.

Mr. Richards: Does my hon. Friend have any information about the views of the Scottish business community on the financial settlement for local government next year, especially in the light of the Labour party's proposals for devolution and the disclosures of the level of uncollected taxes and the fact that some 54 per cent. of Scottish gross domestic product may be taken up in public expenditure when the target for the UK as a whole is 40 per cent.?

Mr. Kynoch: Business must regard local government with amazement when Glasgow cries out that it is short of funds but spends some £400,000 on painting the Clyde red to celebrate the centenary of the Scottish Trades Union Congress. What has that to do with providing services to the people of Glasgow? As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the £200 million or so of uncollected tax could mean that band D council tax payers would receive a cheque. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) may be interested to know that, if the £25 million uncollected tax in Dundee were applied to band D council tax, it would reduce it by 68 per cent.

Mr. David Marshall: Does the Minister have any clue about the seriousness of the situation facing the people of Glasgow as a result of cuts in the budgets of Scottish Homes, the Greater Glasgow health board and Glasgow Development Agency, and the almost total lack of inward investment projects attracted by Locate in Scotland, which has been singularly unsuccessful in doing anything on behalf of the city? As Glasgow is Scotland's metropolitan area, when will the Minister drop his anti-Glasgow bias and do something to benefit the people of Glasgow, instead of carping all the time?

Mr. Kynoch: I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman does not recognise that I was present at the announcement of an inward investment for Glasgow only the other day—a call centre for Polaroid. Several call centres, with several hundred jobs, have gone to Glasgow. The hon. Gentleman complains about Glasgow development agency's budget, but it has not yet been told its budget for next year. Perhaps he should get his facts right.

Mr. Stewart: Is my hon. Friend aware that local authority expenditure in Glasgow is 57 per cent. higher per head of population than in neighbouring East Renfrewshire? That is unsurprising, as Glasgow does not know how many social workers it has. Is it not time that the Scottish Office moved resources away from high-spending cities to needy outlying areas which would spend the money far more effectively?

Mr. Kynoch: Having been the Minister responsible for local government in Scotland very successfully for many years, my hon. Friend knows how the allocation of funds to local authorities works, using a formula based on discussions between the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Scottish Office. To give Glasgow a little more time to adjust to the formula allocation, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last year gave it an extra £15 million. Councillor Gould, when he came to see the Secretary of State, said that he would use that time wisely. The fact that the social work budget has been exceeded six months into the new year by £3.4 million does not say much for the financial controls. I hope that at the end of the year Glasgow will have done what it agreed to do almost 12 months ago.

Mrs. Ray Michie: It will no doubt be music to the Minister's ears to hear that Argyll and Bute council is embarked on cost cutting and so-called efficiency savings with proposals to axe staff and close three rural schools, one of which is on an island. Why will he not accept that Argyll and Bute, with so many islands to service—which, as he knows, is a costly business—should qualify for the special islands needs allowance?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Lady has raised the matter with me before, and Argyll and Bute council raised it when I visited in the summer. I am well aware of the council's concerns and needs, which must be reflected in the grant-aided expenditure formula that is applied to it. That is not a matter for me or for the Secretary of State, but for the joint COSLA and Scottish Office distribution committee. I know that the hon. Lady's council has been putting its point to the distribution committee, and I urge it, if it believes that it has a case, to continue to do so.

Mr. George Robertson: Will the Minister admit that the crisis created by the local Government settlement this year, which has at its roots the costs left behind by the gerrymandering of local government by the Conservative Government, will impact upon real services for real people, including schools in the Stirling constituency, which will be badly hit next year as a consequence? Is it not true that that settlement will also impact upon environmental health departments in councils all over Scotland, and therefore hinder their ability to deal with the type of food poisoning outbreaks that we have seen in the past month?

When will Ministers accept responsibility and answer questions about what they did or did not do at the beginning of the E. coli crisis? What have they got to hide? Why are they afraid to answer the questions that have been repeatedly asked about it? They must stop passing the blame to local authorities and carry the can.

Mr. Kynoch: That is the hon. Member who believes that he is capable of being Secretary of State for Scotland. I am disappointed that he does not recognise the responsibilities outlined in the Food Safety Act 1990: it is local authorities' concern, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made perfectly clear. I hoped that the hon. Gentleman would praise the work of his Labour council and the council executive for what they have done during the difficult crisis.

On local government funding, the hon. Member constantly says that we do not give enough to local Government, but constantly refuses to say where he would take from in order to give local government more. If he is serious about being part of a potential Government of the country it is about time he told the House and the country where he would sacrifice spending in order to give it to local government, which is more than well funded in relation to the rest of the United Kingdom.

Homelessness

9. Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met Shelter to discuss homelessness in Scotland. [8140]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: On 29 November.

Ms Cunningham: Does the Minister agree that the right to a warm, secure and affordable home is a fundamental human right? Has he seen the recent figures from Shelter, which show a 63 per cent. rise in homelessness in Scotland in the past 10 years? In view of that, how can he justify the devastating cuts in the public sector housing budget this year? Will he not at least try to do something to help by commuting the housing debt, in the same way as was done for the private water authorities in England?

Mr. Robertson: The selective quoting of statistics does the House no good. The hon. Lady should perhaps have quoted the figure which shows that homelessness in Scotland is falling—last year it fell by 3 per cent. Shelter does our local authorities no credit by not giving them the credit for providing homes for 90 per cent. of families deemed unintentionally homeless and therefore in priority need. As for the commutation of debt, the hon. Lady tries to imply that there is some magic way of getting rid of the £4 billion debt. It must be picked up by someone. She has asked for it to be transferred to the national Exchequer. Her party's spending proposal have been independently costed and would cause a budget deficit of about £8 billion in Scotland. She has just said that she would add 50 per cent., bringing it up to £12 billion.

Mr. Davidson: Will the Minister accept that his unwillingness to express any concern about the levels of homelessness in Scotland causes regret within Scotland? Simply to bluff and bluster and to put questions to the House does not answer the real difficulties in Scotland. Simply to shout and bawl is not an adequate response to the many people in my constituency and in others who do not have a warm, dry house to live in. When will he take those problems seriously?

Mr. Robertson: If I did not care about the plight of the homeless in Scotland, I would not have issued a new draft code on homelessness as guidance for local authorities. I would not have put it out for consultation, nor withdrawn it because of some of the concerns that were expressed. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have repeatedly said that we are willing to consult all the relevant bodies in the next few weeks with regard to revising the draft code to ensure that it meets Scottish circumstances in a particularly Scottish way. That does not strike me as the action of a Government who do not care.

10. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made in introducing a rough sleepers initiative in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [8141]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: My right hon. Friend issued a consultation paper on the rough sleepers initiative on 11 December.

Sir Russell Johnston: The Minister knows that my question was tabled before the statement was made. Following the variety of questions on housing, has the Minister seen the latest Shelter estimate that the housing waiting list in Scotland is now longer, at 194,579, than it has ever been? Is that not a dreadful comment at the end of 17 years of Tory government?

Mr. Robertson: I regret that the hon. Gentleman chooses to question me about rough sleepers. When we introduce a rough sleepers initiative, he chooses to ignore the fact that we have done so. That is a matter of real regret. If the hon. Gentleman genuinely had at heart the issue of rough sleeping in Scotland, he would not have continued with that question.

In reply to a previous question, I said that 2.5 per cent. of all council houses in Scotland are vacant. I hope that all local authorities, including the hon. Gentleman's, will turn their attention to getting those houses back into use.

Ms Rachel Squire: Is the Minister aware that approximately 1,800 pensioners in Scotland become homeless every year and that there is a severe shortage of all types of sheltered accommodation, especially public rented accommodation, to meet the needs of elderly and disabled people? Is he aware that, far from enabling local authorities to adapt and improve unsuitable housing that would allow the elderly to remain and live in the community, the Government's housing policies—especially the increase from 25 per cent. to 75 per cent. for debt redemption—will force many elderly people to abandon their homes and communities and go into institutional care?

Mr. Robertson: First, the hon. Lady obviously has not heard of our care and repair policy, which provides funds to allow elderly people to do the very thing that she describes—to adapt their own homes so that they can stay in them. The hon. Lady is right to say that that is where many of them wish to remain.

Perhaps the hon. Lady's remarks would be better directed towards hon. Members on the Labour Front Bench, who have committed not one more penny than my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has committed to spending on housing in Scotland. I am happy to stand by the plans that my right hon. Friend outlined. The hon. Lady's own Front Benchers will not commit one penny more for housing in Scotland. I hope that she questions them in the same way as she has questioned me.

11. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many responses he received in the consultation process on the draft code of guidance on homelessness; and when he expects to report his conclusions. [8142]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: We have received 140 responses to the consultation document and we shall publish the final code early next year.

Mr. Welsh: Will the Minister admit that not one closing date submission supported temporary housing for the homeless? Does he accept that temporary housing will not solve the problem, and that only permanent housing will meet the needs of individuals and families who are homeless in Scotland?

Mr. Robertson: Indeed, not one response supported it, which is why we have gone on to further consultation, and that is one of the elements under review.

Public Expenditure Statement

12. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on his public expenditure statement presented to the Scottish Grand Committee on 9 December. [8143]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My public expenditure plans have been welcomed by the universities, Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise and the Scottish Tourist Board and many others.

Mr. Salmond: And by the RAF.

Mr. Forsyth: Yes, and by the RAF.

Mr. Salmond: Was not the Secretary of State ashamed at having to confirm that total research spending on E. coli 0157 by the Scottish Office over a six-year period amounted to a mere £500,000? Given that it was known well before the tragedy in Lanarkshire that we had a particular problem with E. coli 0157 in Scotland, is that not a deplorably low amount? Does it not typify an attitude in Scottish Office towards research spending, environmental health and public safety which reeks of complacency? Was not the so-called insider in the Health Department who was quoted this weekend right to say that the current hyperactivity of the Secretary of State for Scotland is a cover for his inactivity when it mattered?

Mr. Forsyth: The short answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is no. I am surprised by his ignorance of the way in which research is commissioned by the Government. As he knows, it is done on the advice of the chief scientist's office. He also knows that the Department of Health is the lead Department in that respect. Given that he has been told repeatedly that research into E. coli is more than £2 million, but insists on quoting the Scottish Office figure instead of that for the Department of Health, I can only assume that he is deliberately trying to distort the situation and to make cheap political capital out of a very distressing situation in Scotland. I am sure that he will earn everyone's contempt for doing so.

Mr. Congdon rose—

[HON. MEMBERS: "Who is he?"]

Mr. Congdon: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity to remind those who demand higher public expenditure in Scotland that it is already higher per head than it is in England? Does he agree that those who persist in their demands for devolution will have to answer to taxpayers in England as to why we should continue to subsidise such high levels of public expenditure if they want a devolved Parliament?

Mr. Forsyth: I noticed that several Opposition Members asked "Who is he?" when my hon. Friend asked the question. The answer is that my hon. Friend is one of many Members of the House who would determine Scotland's budget if we ever had a Scottish Parliament with tax-raising powers. It would not be determined by Scottish Members of Parliament sitting in a Scottish Parliament. Those Opposition Members who jeer and sneer at the key point that my hon. Friend makes—that devolution threatens Scotland's public services—should recognise the strength of that argument and realise that their responsibility is to the people of Scotland, not to socialism and the Scottish Labour party.

Private Finance Initiative

13. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which hospital projects he has approved for financing under the private finance initiative. [8144]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Ferryfield elderly care facility in Edinburgh, information systems at Law and Yorkhill hospitals and several contracts for care beds, medical analysis equipment and clinical waste disposal have been approved for financing under the private finance initiative by my right hon Friend or have been taken forward by health service bodies under delegated authority. A further 15 projects with a capital value of £588 million are at an advanced stage.

Mr. Foulkes: You will have noticed, Madam Speaker, that the Minister did not mention the East Ayrshire community hospital. In view of all the written questions that I have tabled and in view of the fact that the project was delayed for at least two years by the Minister's predecessor as a result of spurious consultation about alternative sites and has now been delayed for another six months because of the PFI proposal, when there is money in the Scottish Office budget to fund that hospital by traditional means, why does the Minister not give it the go-ahead, instead of putting political dogma above my constituents' interests?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: First, the project has not been delayed as the hon. Gentleman says. Ayrshire and Arran Community Healthcare NHS trust won the competition with other trusts on the basis of providing a new hospital. We are determined to make progress on a PFI proposal so that that important facility can be secured. Ayrshire and Arran Community Healthcare NHS trust must fully explore whether it can provide a hospital under the PFI. The trust is confident that it can do so by further negotiation. Revised proposals from the bidder arrived as recently as mid-November. Those reduced the costs, but further negotiations are required. Negotiations should proceed as quickly as possible.

Full-time Students

15. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for expanding the number of full-time students in further education taking higher level courses with particular reference to expanding the availability of bursaries. [8146]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Except in those colleges involved in the university of the highlands and islands project, we have no further plans to expand the number of full-time students in further education taking higher education courses. Future arrangements for bursaries are currently under review.

Mr. Worthington: I thank the Minister for responding to the request by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) and myself to provide bursary money to enable students at Clydebank to continue their courses, which they had been prevented from doing as a result of underfunding.

Does the Minister realise that about half the colleges in Scotland which are in financial trouble will be unable to expand to attract more students next year because there will not be the bursary money to support those students in their courses?

Mr. Robertson: I thank the hon. Gentlemen for coming in. We had a useful meeting, which helped to address some of the problems at that college. Regarding the situation on bursaries, I hope that the hon. Gentleman is aware that we are reviewing all this and we have asked for comments from the entire sector with a view to seeing whether any changes need to be made. We have an open mind on that. Last Friday, I had a useful meeting in Inverness with the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) and some of his college principals. If the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington), the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) or any other hon. Member has any views that he wishes to feed in, I am willing to listen to representations and consider the matter.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the Minister carefully examine the plans that are being made, and carried out experimentally in England, to provide proper bursaries for dance and drama students, which are not being mirrored in Scotland? It remains an anomaly that discretionary spending is excluding Scottish would-be dancers and dramatic performers from proper further education opportunities.

Mr. Robertson: Yes, indeed: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that I shall look carefully at that; and at any information that he wants to give me beforehand. [Interruption.] My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is shouting from behind me, "What about the Spice Girls?".

Care in the Community

16. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about care in the community in Angus and Perth and Kinross; and if he will make a statement. [8147]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have received representations from service users, independent sector providers and my hon. Friend, which led to an inspection of community care services in Angus and Perth and Kinross. The report was published on 14 November.

Mr. Walker: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Will he confirm that the report showed clearly that the quality of service in the private sector and the local government sector was exactly the same, but that the private sector was £200 per head per week cheaper? Consequently, if the private sector had been used, many more places would have been available, bed blocking in the health service would have been greatly reduced, and the whole service would have operated much more effectively—not just in Perth and Kinross and Angus, but throughout Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. The main finding was that those authorities could achieve long-term savings totalling between £3 million and £6 million by making more use of the independent care sector. We are to introduce directions on information which will require authorities to make public the costs of care in different sectors. I can also confirm that the Secretary of State recently announced an additional £15 million for health boards to reduce pressures that are likely to arise over the winter.

Electronic Tagging

17. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the effectiveness of electronic tagging for convicted offenders. [8148]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Representations on this matter were made by 18 of those who responded to our "Crime and Punishment" White Paper, and we are still receiving representations in connection with our consultation paper on electronic monitoring of young offenders.

Mr. Brazier: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that any assessment of the usefulness of tagging in all parts of the United Kingdom must be based not on considerations of the civil liberties of the convicted offenders but on its effectiveness in preventing future crime and hence its impact on the community and especially on the victims of the crimes?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. Punishment and deterrence are importance. This is a useful disposal. Under the English pilot schemes, curfew orders have been made—most often for burglary, theft, driving while disqualified, possession of drugs and some violent offences. The initial findings are that the pilot schemes have been successful. We believe that this will be a useful disposal for the courts—to ensure, for instance, that football hooligans are restricted to certain areas.

Employment (Eastwood)

18. Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the latest estimate of employment and unemployment in the Eastwood constituency. [8149]

Mr. Kynoch: The figures announced today show that 10.1 per cent. of the work force in the Eastwood constituency were registered unemployed and claiming benefit in November. This shows a fall of 9.7 per cent. since November 1995 and confirms the extent to which Eastwood, like the rest of the country, is benefiting from the Government's very successful economic policies.

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving the House and my constituents those extremely encouraging figures. Does he agree that they show the sustained improvement in employment trends throughout my constituency, in large measure due to the expanding small firms and self-employed sector? Does he further agree that that expansion would be wholly undermined by the increases in business rates threatened by the Labour party?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is absolutely right on that. The policies of the Opposition parties would be counter-productive to the future success of small businesses. That is recognised by the small business owners whom I meet as I go around the country.

Mr. Home Robertson: Given that a number of people from Eastwood work at Scottish Power's headquarters in Cathcart, just as a number of my constituents work at Scottish Power's Cockenzie power station, will the Minister acknowledge that it is vital for the people of Eastwood and of East Lothian that the interconnector between Scotland and Northern Ireland should be constructed, in the interests of both Northern Ireland and Scotland? Will the Secretary of State therefore withdraw the ridiculous, unwarranted and unprecedented conditions that he has attached to the route across south Ayrshire so that this vital project can go ahead in the interests of people on both sides of the Irish sea?

Mr. Foulkes indicated dissent.

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman should look to his left at the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), who was shaking his head throughout the hon. Gentleman's comments. That is yet another split between Opposition Members which I hope the whole House has recognised.

Mr. Beggs: Despite the reply that the Minister has given, does he accept that there are economic benefits for constituents in Eastwood and elsewhere in Scotland if interconnection happens: that jobs will be secured in Scotland, that new jobs will be created, and that we in Northern Ireland will have security of supply and real competition to bring down electricity prices to domestic and industrial consumers, thereby benefiting both Scotland and Northern Ireland?

Mr. Kynoch: Of course I recognise what the hon. Gentleman says, and he will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has stated that he is minded to accept the interconnector, with the condition that four sections should be undergrounded. My right hon. Friend has put that proposal out to swift consultation with interested parties, and responses have to be in by 20 December. Once the responses have been received, my right hon. Friend will reconsider the issue. I am sure that he has heard what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Public Interest Immunity

The Attorney–General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the future of public interest immunity in relation to Government documents as it operates in England and Wales, in the light of the consultation following publication of the Scott report. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor is making a similar statement in another place.

The Government are committed to the principle that there should be the maximum disclosure consistent with protecting essential public interests. The House will recall that the law that prevailed at the time of the Matrix Churchill case was further developed by the House of Lords case of ex parte Wiley in July 1994. Since that case, Ministers have had a gener al discretion to disclose documents without the prior approval of the court, if they consider that to be in the overall public interest.

Against that background, it is the view of Sir Richard Scott that legislation on public interest immunity is neither necessary nor desirable, and the Government agree. Public interest immunity is needed because of the potential conflict between two important public interests—the clear public interest in the administration of justice, which in a criminal case is the fair trial of an accused, and what is sometimes also the clear public interest in the confidentiality of certain documents or information.

The House will bear in mind the fact that the so-called immunity is subject to the ruling of the court, and that, in a criminal case, when Government documents are in issue, the judge himself examines any such document and makes the actual decision on disclosure in the light of the facts of the case.

In their proposals for the future, the Government have had particular regard both to the recommendations of Sir Richard Scott and to the many responses received during the consultation process. The Government's conclusions represent a new approach, which is set out in a paper today being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Under the new approach, Ministers will focus directly on the damage that disclosure would cause. The former division into class and contents claims will no longer be applied. Ministers will claim public interest immunity only when it is believed that disclosure of a document would cause real damage or harm to the public interest.

That new approach constitutes a change in the practice to be adopted by Ministers, but fully respects existing legal principles, as developed by the courts, and is subject to the supervision of the courts. It also accords with the view expressed by the present Lord Chief Justice that "public interest immunity should only be claimed for the bare minimum of documents for which the claim of serious harm can be seen to be clearly justified".

The Government intend that the test shall be rigorously applied before any public interest immunity claim is made for any Government documents. It is impossible in advance to describe such damage exhaustively. The damage may relate to the safety of an individual, such as an informant, or to a regulatory process; or it may be damage to international relations caused by the disclosure of confidential diplomatic communications.

Normally it will be in the form of direct and immediate harm to, for example, the nation's economic interests or our relations with a foreign state. In some cases, it may be indirect or longer-term damage to which the disclosure of the material would contribute, as in the case of damage to a regulatory process. In any event, the nature of the harm will be clearly explained.

This new, restrictive approach will require, so far as possible, the way in which disclosure could cause real damage to the public interest to be clearly identified. Public interest immunity certificates will in future set out in greater detail than before both what the document is and what damage its disclosure would be likely to do—unless to do so would itself cause the damage that the certificate aims to prevent. That will allow even closer scrutiny of claims by the court, which is always the final arbiter.

The new emphasis on the test of serious harm means that Ministers will not, for example, claim PII to protect either internal advice or national security material merely by pointing to the general nature of the document. The only basis for claiming PII will be a belief that disclosure will cause real harm.

In relation to national security, the Government's approach takes into account the types of information that Parliament defined as sensitive in the Intelligence Services Act 1994, although, as I have said, a document will not attract PII simply because it falls into a pre-defined category. Many public interest immunity claims are not the responsibility of Government. Although the Government believe that their approach can be applied more widely, the paper placed in the Library only restricts Government claims.

I am grateful to all those who have contributed to the debate and taken the trouble to respond to the consultation exercise in this complex area. A combination of the revised regime laid down by the House of Lords in ex parte Wiley and the Government's new approach should ensure that PII claims will be significantly less frequent in future. I repeat that any claim in a criminal case will always, in the end, be subject to review by the court itself.

I believe that those factors, combined with the new test based on serious damage, which I have described and which is set out more fully in the paper today being placed in the Library of each House, provide what should prove a sensible, balanced and effective regime for the future; and I commend it to the House.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I am grateful to the Attorney-General for coming to the House to explain the Government's conclusions on the consultations that he set up as long ago as last February—although it has taken a little time. The House will also need time to react properly, and to study his paper that is now in the Library.

First, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that the application of his conclusions to Ministers will not affect the run-of-the-mill informant case and the need to protect such information? Secondly, will he clarify whether—and, if so, where—he departs from the substance of Sir Richard Scott's conclusions? Thirdly, does the abolition of the distinction between class and a contents claim mean effectively—particularly in criminal cases—that only contents claims will be made in future, whatever label they may or may not have?

Fourthly, when the Attorney-General refers to a claim being made only where there is real damage or harm to the public interest, does that mean the same as Lord Templeman meant in Wiley's case when he referred to "substantial" harm to the public interest?

Fifthly, do the Attorney-General's conclusions in adopting Wiley mean that the effect is a wholly new approach by Government? Does he expect that the claims will be made only rarely in criminal cases, and that Ministers will have to judge for themselves in each particular case whether to claim and the width of such a claim, having regard to the possibility of editing?

Sixthly, I welcome the right hon. and learned Gentleman's response to Scott. Ministers should have more time to consider their position, and should not have to consider matters overnight, which was the position in which the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel–Jones) was placed.

Having had a little experience of the urgency of dealing with red boxes, may I ask how this will operate in practice? What is the bottom line of this new approach? Will the more rigorous approach in civil or criminal cases, together with the effect of new legislation, radically reduce the number of claims? Will claims be made only in exceptional cases, after personal examination by Ministers and, where appropriate, a further check by the courts?

Lastly, can we properly anticipate that, when the liberty of the subject is involved, and when a person may go to gaol or receive other punishment, the chances of a wrong decision will be virtually eliminated? When second thoughts occur about a decision that is adverse to an individual, will the Attorney-General instruct those prosecuting to have no hesitation in withdrawing a criminal case, at whatever stage, if documents that may be of assistance to the defence have been withheld?

The Attorney–General: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the welcome that he gave to the substance of the report, and for the way in which he put his questions, which I shall answer in the order in which he raised them.

I confirm that the new approach will not affect run-of-the-mill cases. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has had great experience in that area, and he knows that, in non-government cases involving police reports, informants and so on, the system works well. Although the courts may choose to adopt some of the practices that the Government are adopting, that will be a matter for them. Those practices will not be forced on them, and I expect the system to continue much as before in run-of-the-mill cases.

Secondly, I confirm that the departure from the previous position relates to the old distinction between class and contents claims and the new emphasis on real harm or real damage. It is not helpful to say that they are all contents claims rather than class claims. Class reasoning may be said to operate in some claims. If that is so, it will be clearly explained in the certificate. In every case, the Minister will have to be satisfied that real harm—which is the same as serious harm or serious damage—would be caused.

That brings me to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's fourth point, about whether "real damage" means the same as "substantial harm". In the words of Lord Templeman in the ex parte Wiley case, the straight answer is yes.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's next question was whether there will be fewer such cases in future, following the new approach and the ex parte Wiley case in 1994. He made that point in a number of forms in his last three questions. The straight answer is that I believe that there will be significantly fewer cases.

In fact, the change in the law declared in ex parte Wiley was extremely helpful, because it gave Ministers a discretion where previously there had been an element of rigidity through the need to leave anything except a clear case to the court. For that reason, the number of occasions after 1994 on which public interest immunity certificates had to be used by Ministers was already lower. I am confident that the number will continue to be low in future.

I confirm that the approach is more rigorous. We recognise the importance of giving adequate time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman rightly referred to that: he knows something of the pressures, and I claim to know something of them myself. As the courts in recent criminal cases always looked at the documents, the chances of a miscarriage of justice were happily small.

I can assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman, first, that the court will always continue to see such documents in criminal cases, and secondly that it is one of the key tenets of the prosecution always to keep any prosecution under review. If material emerges that shows that a prosecution ought not to continue, it will then be stopped.

Sir Archibald Hamilton (Epsom and Ewell): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on introducing measures that will certainly give public interest immunity certificates a much better public image. He told us, however, that the judge would make the decision on disclosure. In the light of that, can he tell us whether there have been any miscarriages of justice as a result of the issue of ministerial public interest immunity certificates?

The Attorney–General: I am certainly not aware that any miscarriages of justice have arisen from the issue of a ministerial public interest immunity certificate.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North–East): I welcome what the Attorney-General has told the House, so far as it follows the recommendations in chapter 5 of Sir Richard Scott's report. Can he confirm, however, that, notwithstanding his announcement today, if the procedures that he has outlined had been in place at the time Ministers, could well have signed public interest immunity certificates in the Matrix Churchill case?

Will the Attorney-General also tell the House what his role is to be hereafter? He will recall that Sir Richard Scott was critical of a failure on his part to advise prosecuting counsel to advise, in turn, the judge in the Matrix Churchill case of the reservations of the then President of the Board of Trade when he was called on to sign public interest immunity certificates. Where in the proposals that the Attorney-General has outlined today are the procedures to prevent that from happening again in the future?

The Attorney–General: The hon. and learned Gentleman asked whether, under the new procedure, Ministers might still have signed public interest immunity certificates in the Matrix Churchill case. Yes, I expect that there would have been some certificates. They would have covered fewer documents, but they would have been perfectly properly signed—as, indeed, they were properly perfectly signed under the law as it stood at the time.

That brings me to the hon. and learned Gentleman's second question. There was a disagreement between SirRichard Scott and myself as to the law that was understood at the time. Sir Richard clearly and courteously set out his findings in his report.

On that issue, the House will recall—certainly it will be recalled by the hon. and learned Gentleman, who will have read the report of the debates in the House of Lords—that, while there has been no judicial ruling on the matter, all six Law Lords and former Law Lords who participated in the debate took the view of the law that I had given, and expressly endorsed it. Lord Ackner made that abundantly clear in another place.

Sir Richard Scott himself was good enough—in the House, before the Public Service Committee in May—to make it clear that points made by Lord Ackner, who said that he might have failed to distinguish between the law as it then stood and the law as he thought that it ought to have been, perhaps contained an element of truth. I am very grateful to Sir Richard for saying that.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on getting it right over Matrix Churchill, and welcome the clarification, simplification and improvement of a very complicated area of the law as far as Ministers are concerned. Will he, however, reassure the public that, at the end of the day, it will still be up to the good sense of an independent judiciary to decide whether a public interest immunity certificate should be upheld?

The Attorney–General: My hon. and learned Friend makes a crucial point, which applied in the Matrix Churchill case and applies today. In any criminal case in which public interest immunity is claimed by a Minister of the Crown, the judge will always see the documents, and in the end it will be the judge who decides whether there is any question of withholding such a document from disclosure.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I am grateful to the Attorney-General, who has thrown a very positive light on the issue of public interest immunity certificates, but may I turn his attention to his other responsibility, as Attorney-General for Northern Ireland?

May I ask about the role of public interest immunity certificates in coroners courts in Northern Ireland? Will coroners there have the same powers in relation to those certificates as an ordinary member of the judiciary? As juries' verdicts in Northern Ireland are based on evidence, the withholding of information by either the Royal Ulster Constabulary or the Ministry of Defence from coroners' juries can cause severe damage not only to the public interest but to the interests of individuals in Northern Ireland.

The Attorney–General: As I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware, law and practice in Northern Ireland have developed differently, as indeed they have in Scotland. That is why I was careful to say at the beginning of my statement that the new approach that I have set out applies to England and Wales. The law will continue to be developed in Northern Ireland by the judiciary.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I invite my right hon. and learned Friend to see whether we can change the language, and start to describe these certificates as public interest disclosure certificates, which in effect is what they have become. Will he confirm that, up to Wiley and up to the Scott report, the law and procedure had been set only by judges and not by Ministers or Parliament? Will he also confirm that, in future, the advice of Law Officers to Ministers will be on the basis of a public announcement following a review, as today, or to guide Ministers with the words of judges, as in the past?

The Attorney–General: I understand my hon. Friend's point about nomenclature, but, albeit that "public interest immunity certificate" is not particularly illuminating, "public interest disclosure certificate" might not be much more so. My hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not adopt that suggestion. I can confirm that, up to and including the decision in Wiley and since, the law in this area is judge-made. My statement changes practice only in relation to Government documents which are the subject of certificates by Ministers. My hon. Friend is right: the law in this area will continue to be judge-made.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Perhaps the Attorney-General can explain. I think that this all arose because a number of Ministers said that they had to sign these public interest immunity certificates when there was a prospect of people being sent to gaol. Their defence was, "Look, the Attorney-General told us to sign them." The then President of the Board of Trade had a different view; he said, "Hold on a bit—I'm not too sure about this prospect."

The net result, from what I have heard the Attorney-General say—he can tell me if I am wrong—is that, in similar circumstances where some people could possibly go to gaol, he or another Attorney-General could go to Ministers and say, "Look here, you had better sign these documents." Would they be expected to sign them, or would the Heseltine theory apply? What has really changed? Let us cut all the cackle and hear what the situation is all about.

The Attorney–General: That is a helpful question, from a seeker after truth. The first point that the hon. Gentleman will want confirmed is that there has been no question whatever of suppression in relation to public interest immunity certificates. The whole notion that they were "gagging orders"—a phrase which I might have heard trip off the hon. Gentleman's lips occasionally—

Mr. Skinner: No, I used it last time.

The Attorney–General: I know, but the hon. Gentleman knows better now, and he is not using that language.

They were never "gagging orders", and they are not "gagging orders". If Matrix Churchill were being re-run now, it would be possible for a Minister to have discretion to volunteer disclosure when he felt that the documents could be disclosed even when it was not a clear case in which they were found to be disclosed on any balance of the public interest. Consequently, whether my right hon. Friend would have had to make a certificate at all, or whether he could have made one in relation to many fewer documents, which I believe is likely, is a moot point. It would certainly have been a great many fewer documents.

A combination of the decision in ex parte Wiley and the new approach in my statement will, as I said when I was rightly questioned by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon, lead to many fewer such certificates, covering far fewer such documents in future.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): May I give sincere thanks to my right hon. and learned Friend for what I believe to have been the widest consultation on this topic? Is it not correct that every lawyer who has ever had anything to do with PII certificates was invited to contribute to the consultation process?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the abolition of the class and contents claims announced today will eliminate any chance of injustice in future? Does he also agree that the clear explanation that he has described and that will appear in future certificates will also reduce the possibilities of injustice?

Finally, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the abolition of the blanket use of national security, in line with the evidence given by David Bickford to the Matrix Churchill inquiry, will be abolished? Is that not precisely in line with the undertaking to me and to the House by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster seven minutes, or whenever it was, before the end of the Matrix Churchill debate?

The attorney-general: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome. Taking his last point first, yes, that does fulfil the undertaking of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to my hon. Friend. As part of the consultation, I considered carefully what he had said on the matter, and it has been taken into account, along with the responses from others. I am grateful for his welcome for the clear explanation that will appear in any such certificate, for the ending of the often confusing apparent distinction between class and contents claims, and for the new concentration on real or substantial harm.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I welcome today's proposals, but does the Attorney-General agree that one of the problems is that documents are often considered at the beginning of a trial, when perhaps their full meaning is not fully understood by the tribunal trying the matter? Therefore, would it not be right—will not the Attorney-General give this undertaking—for Law Officers to continue to monitor cases in which documents or ministerial certificates are granted, to ensure that, if the court has misunderstood the full purport of the documents, the officers will intervene and seek to redress that fact?

The Attorney-General: The hon. Gentleman makes interesting points. I expect cases of difficulty to come to the Law Officers. I would not expect every case to come to them as a matter of routine. One of the advantages of the system in a criminal case whereby the judge sees the documents, if they are in issue, at the beginning of the case, is that the judge himself will have in mind the possibility that they may become relevant when they had not initially seemed relevant.

The House will recall that, in the Matrix Churchill case, Judge Smedley initially saw the national security documents. When he first saw them, and heard argument, they did not appear to him to be relevant. Counsel for Mr. Henderson then made it clear that Mr. Henderson was saying that he was an agent of the intelligence services. The judge considered the documents again, and changed his view the following day. That is a short-order example of what could happen after a longer period in another case. That is what the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the label "ministerial gagging order", which the press have attached to PII certificates, is misleading nonsense—like so much else in the newspapers—for the very reason that the effect of that so-called gagging order is to place the documents in question before the trial judge, so that he can decide whether those documents should or should not be admitted into evidence?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Anyone who wished to suppress something would be mad to attach it to a PII certificate, because he would know that, in a criminal case, putting those documents in front of the judge would be the first thing that would happen. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that the expression "gagging order" should not be used. It should not have been used in the past. It has grossly misled the public, and it should not be used in future.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What would have been the position under the new dispensation of Alan Moses QC? Will the Attorney-General reflect on paragraph G13.119 of the Scott report, which states:

"I question the propriety of instructing counsel 'to seek to avoid the disclosure of documents'".

It goes on:

"The authority would not have been forthcoming from Mr. Heseltine . . . The process of seeking the requisite instructions would have exposed the impossible position in which the Treasury Solicitor and Mr. Moses were placed, namely, representing Departments with different views."

Will the House have an opportunity to discuss this after looking at the statement and the documents? Have the views of Professor Anthony Bradley, who wrote a long article in the journal Public Law been taken into account?

The Attorney-General: A great many learned and academic comments have been made on this matter, and, as far as possible, they have been taken into account, but I will not comment on one particular contribution.

I shall now deal with the position of counsel in the case, Mr. Alan Moses, now Mr. Justice Moses, and the fact that he might have been in an impossible position. One of the points that will be considered carefully for the future, and which has been considered in the past on occasion, is whether prosecuting counsel is sufficiently equipped to present arguments on behalf of one Department which may be in conflict with another. That was an interesting and important point made by Sir Richard Scott, and it will be borne in mind carefully in future.

[The Attorney–General]

In this case, it is not correct to say that Mr. Alan Moses was ever seeking to avoid disclosure, in the sense of seeking to suppress anything. He was arguing in good faith—I do not think that anybody has suggested otherwise, and I would challenge them strongly if they did—that the documents were not necessary or relevant to the issues as he saw them, and that he did not believe that they were bound to be disclosed. Had he believed that they were bound to be disclosed, they would have been disclosed, and I would not have had to advise my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister to make his certificate.

The House should be crystal clear. Every such document was put clearly before Judge Smedley. He read every document attached to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's certificate and to the certificates of other Ministers during the argument before the case began, and he made his decision even before the case began. The case did not collapse but ran for four weeks, until it was withdrawn by prosecuting counsel—in accordance with the points made to me by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham)—in exercise of his function of fairness as prosecuting counsel.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Apparently, both sides of the House now agree with open government and with the fact that we have the best civil service in the world. If we are to retain a civil service which is unpoliticised and impartial, it must be confident that advice given to Ministers, particularly that given by private secretaries to Ministers, will be protected unless there is a danger of miscarriage of justice. Can my right hon. and learned Friend reassure civil servants that our traditional way of doing things will be maintained?

The Attorney–General: My hon. Friend has put his finger on one of the trickiest issues, which is the extent to which documents relating to advice to Ministers should be withheld. What I have made clear today is that documents relating to advice to Ministers will be judged by the same test as documents in the category of national security and various other categories, which is whether disclosure would cause serious harm to the public interest. They will have to pass that test. If they can—I can conceive of circumstances in which they would—they would be entitled to protection, subject of course to the overriding views of the judge, to whom they would be shown and who would make his decision after argument.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): As the Attorney-General has said that judges will remain the final arbiters in those matters, will there be any right of appeal against a judge's decision? Unless there is, yet another legal anomaly would seem to be created whereby there is no right of appeal against an individual judge's decision. Under the new arrangements, will the presumption be that Ministers will seek the advice of the Attorney-General in those matters, or that the Attorney-General will offer Ministers such advice?

The Attorney–General: I shall take the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question first. I should expect—this will be the guidance given to the public service—that cases of difficulty, but not every case, will be referred to the Law Officers for advice.

On the first question, if the trial judge decides that a document should not be disclosed, there will, at the end of the case, be an ultimate right of appeal. The general rule in Crown court trials, which I think would apply in this instance, is that the trial judge's ruling on an interlocutory matter of this nature in the case is final at that moment. One could not rush off to the Court of Appeal on the matter at that stage.

If I have mistaken the position in any way, however, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman, as he has raised an interesting point of law, and place a copy of the letter in the Library. But, at the conclusion of the case, if one believed that an injustice had arisen, it would be a ground of appeal.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North–West): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the new PII regime will guarantee protection of sensitive intelligence sources, both human and technical?

The Attorney–General: Broadly, the answer to my hon. Friend's question is yes. He has posited a very sensitive source, which would normally require protection. In such cases, if the information were essential to a fair trial, the prosecution would have to decide either to disclose the information and to proceed with the trial, or to drop the trial to protect the source. The system provides a method of proper protection for such security information, although occasionally it may be necessary to drop a trial to protect the source.

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, West): May I press the Minister further on the issue of ministerial responsibility? As a non-lawyer, I was wondering whether he could explain who in government is responsible as the final arbiter of whether public interest immunity should be claimed? Is it the relevant Secretary of State, or is it the Attorney-General? Is there not an obligation to adhere to the advice of the Attorney-General?

The Attorney–General: The ultimate responsibility is the Minister's, but the Minister will act on advice. If the advice is cogent and appears to be in accordance with the law as it is then understood, the Minister will be likely to follow it, as my right hon. Friend followed the advice that I gave him on that specific occasion. Ultimate responsibility for a decision on whether to claim public interest immunity belongs to the Minister. In future, as I have explained, the matter will be a lot easier, because, first, after ex parte Wiley, the Minister has a much wider discretion; and, secondly, the new approach focuses the mind so very clearly on the test of real harm.

Points of Order

4.8 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I apologise for giving you only relatively short notice of my point of order, but it is on a serious matter that has been brought to my attention. Yesterday, I tabled four questions. The first was to the Lord Chancellor's Department, asking whether the new Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland had ever been a Mason or a member of the Orange Order.

The other three questions were to the Home Office. Two were on the intolerable strip searches to which Miss Rosaleen McAliskey has been subjected in Holloway prison, and the fourth was on why prisoners may receive The Times but not The Irish Times, The Daily Telegraph but not the Belfast Telegraph, the Daily Mail but not the Irish News, and The Sun but not the News Letter.

Those questions were accepted—although not in that form—by the Table Office and were sent to the Stationery Office, where they were received by those appointed by the House to accept and to check such questions.

Those questions did not appear on the Order Paper. When I asked at the Table Office—I apologise again for giving such short notice—I was informed that they had been lost by the privatised HMSO. In my experience of almost 31 years as a Member of Parliament, that has never happened before. Those at the Table Office were most apologetic, but the matter was not their responsibility.

My point of order is to ask whether you, as Speaker and therefore champion of the House and protector of our rights, have received an apology from the newly privatised HMSO for that flagrant dereliction of its duty, and whether apologies will be received by the other hon. Members who suffered as a result of that dereliction. How shall we be protected in future? We table questions not only for our interests, but for the interests of the general public and those asking us to make their opinions and voices known.

Madam Speaker: I had some indication of this matter only while I have been in the Chair since 2.30 pm, so I have not been able to follow through any investigations. The hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that several questions—not only from him but from other hon. Members—were missing. As far as I can understand, this is an unprecedented lapse. I assure him that, as soon as it was noticed, investigations were put under way.

The hon. Gentleman can be assured that, as soon as I have the opportunity this afternoon when I leave the Chair, I shall want to follow through personally on the investigations to see what happened. The hon. Gentleman and the other hon. Members, whose identities I am not aware of at this stage, will certainly receive an apology. We must learn from these mistakes.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): On a different point of order, Madam Speaker. You will be aware of the controversy that arose last night as a result of the votes in the House on Monday evening. There appears to have been nothing less than a conspiracy to pervert the outcome of the votes. If such behaviour goes on with impunity, does it not give a green light to people to follow similar practices in future? Surely the matter should be referred to the Committee of Privileges.

Madam Speaker: Similar points of order have been put to me yesterday and this morning. The Speaker has no business involving herself in the arrangements between the political parties in the House. It is not the business of the Speaker to become involved in such matters.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. At 12.30 pm today, the Leader of the House gave an interim report on the appalling events in Lima last night, saying, among other things, that British subjects could be involved. As the issue involves the safety of embassies around the world and the problems of copycat action, it is a matter of considerable importance, not only to Japan and Peru. Have you received a request from the Government to make a statement on the issues?

Madam Speaker: The direct answer is no, I have not, but of course we still have the day's proceedings to go through. Should the Government feel it necessary or right to make a statement, we can always deal with that later in the day.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): On a different point of order, Madam Speaker—please excuse my voice. May I express to you, in your role as the much valued and respected protector of all Members of Parliament, my concern about developments in the business of the House over the past 10 days?

On 5 December, reported in column 1203 of Hansard, the Leader of the House said—we appreciate the fact that he now gives us much longer notice of business—that there would be a debate on the Protection from Harassment Bill. It was agreed through the usual channels that the debate would last only one day. That seemed appropriate, because it would have allowed me to attend the inaugural meeting of the Highlands and Islands Convention.

On 12 December, the Leader of the House announced that there would be a debate on the common fisheries policy. I challenged that—as reported in column 425 of Hansard—because every hon. Member from the highlands and islands of Scotland has a clear interest in the common fisheries policy, which has implications for our constituencies. I understand from my investigations that it was subsequently decided through the usual channels that two days would be required to discuss the Protection from Harassment Bill, but I had no notification of that, as a Member of Parliament from the highlands and islands.

I had to make a difficult decision on Monday. Fortunately, there was no fog or frost, and we managed to get back to Westminster via normal channels, without having to charter a Royal Air Force plane, in order to vote.

Would you, Madam Speaker, look at the conflicting responsibilities that are placed on individual Members? The issue did not concern individual constituencies; it was a general issue for all Members of Parliament from the highlands and islands. What action can be taken to ensure that we are never placed in the same ludicrous position again, especially in the light of subsequent events? As you know, I had raised points on the matter in the House before those events occurred.

Madam Speaker: I very well remember the hon. Lady raising the issue in business questions. As she will appreciate, the matter is for the usual channels, particularly the Leader of the House. I very much understand that some Members have responsibilities—parliamentary, not constituency responsibilities—outside the House. I take to heart what she has said this afternoon, and shall make it my business to talk the Leader of the House to see what can be done, so that hon. Members are not placed in such a position in future.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Act 1996.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link Act 1996.

Theft (Amendment) Act 1996.

Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office Act 1996.

City of Edinburgh Council Order Confirmation Act 1996.

Edinburgh Merchant Company Order Confirmation Act 1996.

Scottish Borders Council (Jim Clark Memorial Rally) Order Confirmation Act 1996.

Western Isles Council (Berneray Causeway) Order Confirmation Act 1996.

BILL PRESENTED

Sex Offenders

Mr. Secretary Howard, supported by Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew, Mr. Secretary Forsyth and Mr. David Maclean, presented a Bill to require the notification of information to the police by persons who have committed certain sexual offences; to make provision with respect to the commission of certain sexual acts outside the United Kingdom; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 13th January, and to be printed [Bill 66].

Companies (Millennium Computer Compliance)

4.16 pm

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require companies to conduct an audit of the capacity of their computer systems to deal with calendar dates after 31st December 1999 and to report both on those audits and on the actions their directors propose to take in consequence.

The aim of the Bill is to avoid for this country much of the widespread chaos and confusion that it is being increasingly predicted will occur throughout the world at the turn of the century, in just three years' time. I am grateful to hon. Members of all parties who have so willingly offered to sponsor it.

The cause of such Doomsday predictions is the inability of the majority of computer systems to recognise 2000. That is because they use, as we all do, two digits for the year of the date instead of four. Thus, today's date is written as 18/12/96, rather than 18/12/1996.

Unless they are properly reprogrammed, computer systems will recognise 2000 as 1900, or simply reset to some other date. That will mean that they will no longer deliver what they are programmed to deliver, and because so much of our daily lives depend on computers, the result will be, to use a tabloid word, catastrophe. As no one who has looked into the bizarre problem in any detail has so far suggested otherwise, the matter must be of urgent concern to the House.

When the matter was first raised on the Floor of the House in my question to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister just a year ago, it was greeted with expressions of ridicule and disbelief. One year later, many written questions to Ministers in every Department, follow-up questions where appropriate, and my Adjournment debate on 6 June have contributed to increasing coverage in specialist computer magazines and the national press.

Many hon. Members are now aware of the issue, and realise that there is a real problem that must be addressed. I especially appreciate the interest of the hon. Members who attended my briefing meeting last Wednesday, and the fact that the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology has issued a briefing note, No. 89, on "Computer Systems and the Millennium". That is in the Library, and I recommend it as essential background reading.

The briefing note refers to some of the forecasts of the danger of failure to ensure that computer systems are millennium-compliant. Consequences could include payroll systems collapsing so that workers cannot be paid; financial records losing track of investments; invoicing systems failing to generate bills, or charging 100 years' worth of interest; telecommunications networks failing; and problems with supply in utilities such as gas and electricity.

We must also take into account the possible unpredictable behaviour of embedded microchip systems in places such as elevators, bank vaults and medical equipment, and in Government systems such as those responsible for benefit payments, for maintaining criminal and medical records and for revenue collection.

In response to my Adjournment debate in June, my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology talked about the action that the Government were taking on their computer systems—which are not, of course, the concern of my Bill. He also mentioned the Government initiatives to encourage awareness of the problem in the private sector. Those include establishing TaskForce 2000, in co-operation with the Confederation of British Industry and the Computing Services and Software Association.

My hon. Friend gave the House two especially telling warnings during my Adjournment debate. He said:

"some companies will go out of business if they have not tackled the problem, or not ensured that their suppliers have tackled it . . . it is a management problem that must be dealt with at the top . . . The Government cannot do it for them. It is no use companies coming to us in 1999 and saying, 'The Government have not fixed it.' The Government did not install the computer software. Failure to deal with the problem could lead to commercial collapse".—[Official Report, 6 June 1996; Vol. 278, c. 818-9.]

My Bill is designed to avoid such commercial collapse. Even responsible companies that have taken the necessary action will find that others with which they have dealings, such as their suppliers, will not have taken action, which will make all those in the supply chain vulnerable to business failure. Truly the chain will be only as strong as its weakest link. I do not believe that all the warning, advising and cajoling in the world will be enough to ensure that the new millennium will begin trouble-free.

Like the Government, I do not want more regulation and red tape to be imposed upon businesses. Some concern has been expressed that my Bill might add to the many burdens that already fall on them. However, it should not add to the burden, because it merely clarifies an existing duty for directors of companies and their auditors to give shareholders in the annual report a true and fair assessment of the company as a going concern for the foreseeable future.

As the future is uncertain, that usually means looking no further than 12 to 15 months ahead. However, the effects of the unique problem that I am talking about can be assessed now, and a view taken on whether the company will be a going concern in the year 2000 if action is not taken now. Indeed, action must be taken now. It will be no use trying to solve the problem in 1999. Most information technology projects take several years to implement, and this will be the largest information technology project that firms will ever have undertaken.

For instance, British Telecom intends to spend hundreds of millions of pounds simply to ensure that its telecommunications system will work in three years' time. Auditors who sign company accounts for the financial year 1997-98 and beyond will leave themselves liable to legal action by shareholders of firms that go out of business because they did not take action in time.

My Bill is designed to avoid the prospect of huge numbers of legal cases in the new millennium, with costly attempts to determine who is to blame for companies' failure.

The Bill will require companies to conduct audits of the capacity of their computer systems to deal with calendar dates after 31 December 1999 and to report both on the audit and the actions that their directors propose to take in consequence. It is an amendment of the Companies Act 1985, which is the principal company statute in force, and of the duty to prepare a director's report. Both obligations are placed on directors rather than companies.

If the House were to allow me to introduce the Bill today, there may be enough time for it to be given the Royal Assent in the spring, so that it could apply to company reports for the financial years ending in 1998 and 1999. That might be sufficient, with the work of TaskForce 2000 and other initiatives by the private sector and the computer industry, to avoid much of the incalculable chaos that is predicted if too little is done.

I accept that there is a cost to checking computer systems for their millennium compliance but the cost of non-compliance, which may mean going out of business, is far greater. This is a race against time. There are only 750 working days left. The problem is one of the greatest challenges facing business management. Like the change in the millennium, it cannot be avoided. That is why I hope that the House will give me leave to introduce the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Atkinson, Mr. Richard Caborn, Mr. Paul Channon, Sir John Cope, Mr. Tam Dalyell, Sir Anthony Durant, Sir Russell Johnston, Sir Dudley Smith, Rev. Martin Smyth, Mr. Stephen Timms, Mr. John Townend and Mr. Dafydd Wigley.

Companies (Millennium Computer Compliance)

Mr. David Atkinson accordingly presented a Bill to require companies to conduct an audit of the capacity of their computer systems to deal with calendar dates after 31st December 1999 and to report both on those audits and on the actions their directors propose to take in consequence: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 24 January, and to be printed [Bill 67].

Orders of the Day

Protection from Harassment Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 17 December].

[SIR GEOFFREY LOFTHOUSE in the Chair]

4.26 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. As you know, last night, amendment No. 13 was passed by 179 to 172 votes, to strengthen the Bill. [Interruption.] I apologise, Sir Geoffrey. I think that yesterday the Chairman was adorned with a knighthood perhaps in anticipation of an event this Christmas; I was trying to correct myself.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department applauded our reasons for tabling amendment No. 13 and described its mover, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), as having the best possible motives. The Minister's only objection was that our proposal was akin to punishment and not appropriate to civil courts. In view of that and the passage of the amendment, would it be for the convenience of the Committee for you to invite the Minister to explain the Government's intentions, especially as there is no time between Committee and Report?

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): Further to that point of order, Sir Geoffrey. It is not the Government's intention to hold up progress on the Bill. We wish it to reach another place as speedily as possible. We will therefore not today seek to overturn the amendment on Report. However, that we are courteous in commenting that Opposition amendments are not "born out of malice", or that we can "see some merit" in them, does not mean that it would be sensible to leave amendment No. 13 in the Bill. The Opposition spokesman should not confuse our customary courtesy in talking about the amendments with an assumption that we believe that there is considerable merit in them.

When we come to Third Reading, I shall explain briefly why we think that the amendment is not sensible. We shall seek in another place to remove it from the Bill, but we do not wish to take any action that would cause any delay to the Bill today.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick–upon–Tweed): Further to that point of order, Sir Geoffrey. Although I welcome the Minister's statement that he does not seek today to reverse the decision on the amendment, I hope that you will acknowledge that the procedures of the House are designed to enable Bills to be amended. Some of the comments by Conservative Members appear to suggest that the Government bring Bills before the House that are totally without fault and incapable of amendment. Were that so, we would not need any of those procedures and the Government would not have to come back with fresh legislation to correct mistakes.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): That is not a matter for the Chair.

Clause 3

CIVIL REMEDY

Amendment proposed [17 December]: No. 14, in page 2, line 8, at the end to insert the words—

'(2B) In considering whether to order an injunction in proceedings under this section, a court shall have primary regard to whether such an order is necessary for the protection of what the court considers are the victim's legitimate interests.'.—[Ms Janet Anderson.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

4.30 pm

The First Deputy Chairman: I remind the Committee that with this we are discussing the following amendments: No. 29, in page 2, line 8, at end insert—

'(2A) Civil proceedings which include a claim under this section for an injunction shall not be referred to arbitration (whether under section 64 of the County Courts Act 1984, or otherwise) without the consent of all the parties to the action.'.

No. 4, in page 2, leave out lines 9 to 24.

No. 25, in clause 8, page 4, line 36, at end insert—

'(5B) In considering whether to order an interdict or interim interdict in proceedings under this section, a court shall have primary regard to whether such an order is necessary for the protection of what the court considers are the pursuer's legitimate interests'.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I thought it right, as a courtesy to you, Sir Geoffrey, and to the Committee, to reappear to continue the speech that I started yesterday evening. I must say, however, that any thoughts that I had on amendments Nos. 14 and 25 have, with the passage of time, become a little cloudy. I cannot quite remember why I was so enthusiastic to address the Committee on them. Furthermore, I notice from the clock that I am due any second to chair the proceedings of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, so the Committee will be pleased to hear that I shall not detain it for long.

I shall detain it only long enough to make the observation that amendment No. 14 requires a court to have an injunction

"primary regard to whether"

"is necessary for the protection of what the court considers are the victim's legitimate interests."

That seems to me to be nonsense, because it is totally unnecessary. Of course, any civil court considering an injunction will have primary regard to whether an injunction was necessary for the protection of the victim.

Amendment No. 25 invites the Scottish court to have primary regard to "whether such an order is necessary for the protection of what the court considers are the pursuer's legitimate interests".

That is the stalker.

Mr. Beith: It is the plaintiff.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: That just shows the effect that the passage of a few hours and much political activity have upon the mind of even the acutest of lawyers who address hon. Members on such an important matter.

I am bound to conclude that, if the point on the Scottish interest advanced by Opposition Members is the same as that advanced by Opposition Members representing the English and Welsh interest, my observation about amendment No. 14 applies exactly to amendment No. 25. It is unnecessary to remind a court in a civil action for an injunction that its primary obligation is to have regard to the interests of the victim before making such an order.

In the climate of yesterday night, I intended to observe that, as the amendments were totally unnecessary and otiose, they must have been tabled either as probing ones—I understand that that was not the intention—or to waste time. As we are interested in maintaining an even keel between the parties, however, I shall forbear to repeat the observation that I intended to make last evening and satisfy myself with my observation about the totally unnecessary nature of amendments Nos. 14 and 25.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Gary Streeter): The debate on this group of amendments has been useful, lively and action-packed.

Amendment No. 14 could be intended to focus the court's mind on the needs of the victim or on the liberty of the defendant; but, either way, the amendment is unnecessary. The court will decide whether to make an injunction on the evidence produced by the victim and the defendant. If it finds that the victim's claim in respect of harassment is made out, it will include in any order that it makes whatever terms are appropriate for the necessary protection of the victim. It will also have in mind the need for any restraints that the order places on the defendant to be reasonable. A defendant who feels that the injunction contains terms that are not necessary for the protection of the victim or that are an unfair restraint may appeal against the order. The amendment therefore adds no benefit to the victim, the defendant or the powers of the court.

Amendment No. 29 seeks to ensure that civil claims in respect of harassment cannot be referred to arbitration without the consent of all parties. Section 64 of the County Courts Act 1984 enables rules to be made requiring the referral of county court cases to arbitration and, technically, harassment cases could be covered by those arrangements. It is, however, impossible to envisage circumstances in which referral to arbitration could be appropriate, because an arbitrator cannot grant an injunction—only the courts can do that.

The consent of the parties to arbitration is a rather hollow condition, because it would clearly be unpalatable to a victim who was seeking an injunction to accept a reference to arbitration. The effect would be to deny the victim's claim without hearing it. I hope that it goes without saying that there is no intention of introducing rules requiring harassment to be dealt with by arbitration, but, because it anticipates circumstances that it is impossible to conceive of, the amendment is unnecessary.

Amendment No. 4 is bad. The provisions that it cuts out of the Bill are part of the important protection that we seek to give to victims of harassment. The effect would be to place on the victim's shoulders the responsibility for collecting evidence of the breach and bringing the matter back to court. It may be that, in some cases, the victim would prefer to proceed against a defendant who breached a civil injunction by restoring the proceedings to the civil court and seeking the court's sanction for contempt; but the amendment would make that compulsory.

The amendment would also mean that, as long as the defendant remained at large, the harassment could continue. By contrast, the provisions that the amendment would delete would enable the police to act promptly and decisively on behalf of the victim—

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Will the Minister confirm that the tests in civil courts are not nearly as strict as those in the criminal courts? In fact, injunctions can be granted without the person against whom the injunction is being sought being present in court. Is he confident that, under the procedure in the Bill of using a civil injunction and enforcing it through the criminal courts, the rights of the individual to know exactly what is occurring will be protected?

Mr. Streeter: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that, in a criminal court, the test applied is "beyond all reasonable doubt", whereas in the civil courts it is "the balance of probabilities". One of the main reasons for introducing the civil tort is to gain access to that lesser test, so that more victims or potential victims might be protected. I am confident that the courts will always act in a way that protects the civil liberties of those involved in a case.

To return to the sentence that I was halfway through: by contrast, the provisions that the amendment would delete would enable the police to act promptly and decisively on behalf of the victim, to arrest a defendant who breaches an injunction and to investigate the circumstances of that breach and collect the necessary evidence. A defendant who does not breach the court's order has nothing to fear from those provisions, but deleting them substantially diminishes the protection that we want to give to victims.

Amendment No. 25 attempts to do for Scotland what amendment No. 14 would do for England and Wales, but interdict provides good protection for a victim or potential victim. For example, it can prohibit a stalker from taking a specific action, such as writing to the victim. Interdict is a remedy that is well used and familiar both to the courts and to those who need the protection that it can give. As a matter of course, in considering whether to grant interdict or interim interdict, a Scottish court would take fully into account the interests of the victim or potential victim. There is no need to place any further duty on the court, so, like amendment No. 14, amendment No. 25 is unnecessary.

I ask the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) to withdraw her amendment.

Ms Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen): We have had a useful debate, and it is not our intention to delay the Committee, because we are anxious that the Bill should make speedy progress. When discussing these matters, it is important that we pay particular attention to the interests of victims. Nevertheless, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5

RESTRAINING ORDERS

Mr. Bennett: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 3, line 17, leave out

'or any other person mentioned in the order'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 8, in page 3, line 22, leave out 'or until further order'.

Mr. Bennett: I have two questions. Amendment No. 7 seeks to leave out the words:

"or any other person mentioned in the order".

Will that person have to consent to being included in the order?

Amendment No. 8 concerns how long the period should be. Are there not considerable advantages in having specific rather than indefinite periods, and would it not be better to define a period, however long, than to allow the order to run indefinitely?

Mr. Maclean: Amendment No. 7 would limit to victims of an offence defined in clauses 2 or 4 the protection afforded by a restraining order granted by a criminal court. Under the terms of the Bill, a court has the power to make an order to protect not only the victim, but any other person mentioned in the order. The amendment would prevent a court making an order to protect those, other than the victim, whom the court has reasonable grounds for believing that the stalker might attempt to harass. Most obviously, that would exclude from the scope of such an order the family, other co-habitees or close friends of the victim. I believe that we would all agree that that is unacceptable.

We are aware that some stalkers attempt to broaden their campaign of intimidation against a person by also contacting and approaching those whom the victim holds dear. The courts must have the power to protect such people with the restraining order, and, obviously, the courts must be aware that the person who is being protected is concerned and wants that protection.

I shall now discuss amendment No. 8. Clause 5(3) enables a court to make a restraining order for a specified period or until further notice. Allowing the court to make an order until such time as a further order is made is essential for the occasions when a court is not in a position to know, when it makes the order, how long it needs to be in force to have the desired effect.

It is not difficult to envisage such circumstances. If the stalking is extreme, the victim may need to be protected indefinitely. Allowing the courts to make an open-ended order, which clause 5(4) allows, to be discharged on the application of the prosecution, provides maximum flexibility to the courts to make an order for a period tailored to the circumstances of the case, and it prevents unnecessary hassle for the victim in having to return to the courts to have orders renewed—not that there is great expense involved in returning to renew them, but it is an unnecessary hassle, which could be avoided in some cases.

Mr. Bennett: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Following last night's debate, certain issues have been left up in the air and we shall hear more when the Bill goes to the House of Lords. In view of that, it would not be sensible to discuss amendment No. 15, so I do not intend to move it.

Clauses 9 to 12 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13

EXTENT

4.45 pm

Mrs. Helen Liddell (Monklands, East): I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 7, leave out line 10 and insert—

'(1) Sections 1 and 2 extend to England and Wales and Scotland

(1A) Sections 3 to 7 extend to England and Wales only'.

The purpose of the amendment is to create a separate criminal offence in Scotland, although I regret to say that the Secretary of State for Scotland has said that he views it as a wrecking amendment. That is not our intention at all. We view it as an opportunity to correct some of the shortcomings which have become apparent in Scottish law and which will become even more obvious if the Bill receives Royal Assent and is implemented in England and Wales.

The subject matter of the debate has been gone over extensively in recent weeks in the House, when my hon. Friends the Members for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) and for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) have made broadly similar points in relation to the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Bill. I agree with what the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock) said last night about the Government stretching the good will of Members of this House to the very limit. We have co-operated to the best of our ability to get the legislation on the statute book as quickly as possible, so it is regrettable that Scottish Office Ministers did not see fit to consult the Opposition on the aspects of the Bill that relate to Scots law. There are nevertheless a number of alterations that we would want to make to the Bill.

The situation in Scotland will be measurably different from that in England and Wales following enactment of the legislation. I should like to draw attention to the great success of my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson), whose persistent efforts have ensured that this legislation is before the Committee today. The problem remains that men and women in Scotland will assume that there is a separate crime of stalking in Scotland even though there will be none.

Much has been made of the fact that the Scottish common law breach of the peace offence is supposedly sufficient to cover the crime of stalking or harassment. It is my contention—and that of a number of the victims of stalking—that that law is not in itself sufficient to deal with the problems created by such harassment. There is a tinge of complacency in the attitude of the Government and of some members of the legal profession when it comes to how the law on breach of the peace can operate in Scotland, and to the penalties that can be handed down as a result.

I stress that it is only because the official Opposition have done all in our power to get the Bill through as quickly as possible that we have managed to come thus far in less than 24 hours; it remains a matter of regret that the Bill's provisions will do little to change the law in Scotland. The Law Society of Scotland has written to the Minister responsible for home affairs and health at the Scottish Office, to say that it has considered the measure

"and notes that the Scottish clauses effectively restate, in modern terminology, the existing law which offers protection from harassment by way of assault."

It is important that we look further than the existing law in seeking to protect the victims of harassment in Scotland.

Not being a lawyer myself, I have taken advice from, among others, the university of Strathclyde department of law. I was interested in comments by Professor Alan Miller, a visiting professor at the university of Strathclyde and also the chairman of the Scottish Council for Civil Liberties. Professor Miller is of the view that, in so far as the Bill covers harassment, it does not add to existing remedies already available in Scots law, and he makes the important point—I ask the Committee to reflect on it seriously—that the Bill probably would not be used by practitioners, who would continue to seek interdicts.

I hope that the Minister will respond to Professor Miller's further point that, if the law were used, it would certainly have resource implications for a diminishing civil legal aid budget. The nature of the legislation is to seek civil redress for the person who has been subjected to harassment. The dictum from Dicey that justice is open to all, like the Ritz, applies as much in Scotland as it does south of the border. Those who have resources can take court action: those who do not have resources need to apply for legal aid. We already know that there is what could be described as a crisis in civil legal aid in Scotland. It is the view of the Law Society and of Professor Alan Miller that the Bill would not substantially alter the law in Scotland, and the Bill could also lull people into a false sense of security.

We have also to bear it in mind that one important aspect of the legislation, which has been mentioned by right hon. and hon. Members, is its deterrent impact. Many of the people who commit harassment or stalking do not believe that they are doing anything wrong. Some of them are psychologically disordered, but some think that they are doing nothing more than pursuing a vigorous courtship. The distress that they can cause to their victims is considerable and it needs to be made clear to people, by making it a separate offence, that stalking or harassment is an unacceptable form of behaviour. If that were done, it would be of enormous assistance to the police and the victims. In particular, Victim Support has made it clear that a separate crime would greatly assist the prosecution of those guilty of harassment.

I notice that the Government have drawn attention to the fact that, in Scotland, a specific statutory right to be free of harassment has been created. That right looks nice on paper, but it is the view of the eminent Scottish lawyer Alastair Bonnington, who is a lecturer in criminal procedure, that it is "about as worthwhile as giving a woman a right not to be raped. It is no more than the expression of a pious hope that such conduct will cease."

It is important to give those who are victims of harassment and stalking a clear message that goes beyond a pious hope that such behaviour will end.

Scottish Members will be aware of two significant cases that have appeared before the Scottish courts recently. One relates to Ms Louise Durie, who lives in the Ayrshire village of Waterside and was, for nine months, vigorously pursued by her next-door neighbour. She suffered appalling harassment, as did her partner. The harassment was even made worse when charges were made against Mr. Pickering, who was the harasser, and he was released on bail and returned home to pursue his harassment. Louise Durie's experience was recounted extensively in the Scottish press. She came to believe that Scottish law—and, indeed, English law—should be changed immediately to make stalking a specific criminal offence with heavy penalties, in order to deter those who would make others suffer in the way that she had suffered. Ms Durie said that, although she had been through "months of hell", it appeared that the man involved faced only a short gaol term.

Ms Durie drew attention to the need for her tormentor to undergo a course of counselling—which he did not undertake—as a result of his offences. She recognised that he was in need of some psychological assistance. Ms Durie made a very important point in relation to the Secretary of State for Scotland, who she said

"cannot begin to imagine the living hell which victims go through. If he could, then legislation would be through in a flash."

It is often assumed that women are the only victims of stalking and harassment. However, another very important case in Scotland concerns a couple: Professor Reggie von Zugbach and his wife Susanna. They were the victims of a disturbed academic who was jealous of their marriage. In a letter to the von Zugbachs, he wrote:

"God has allowed you to go into this marriage with one purpose . . . namely to break you, because there is no other way."

The perpetrator was arrested in connection with the offences and charged with breach of the peace, but, when a file was returned from the procurator fiscal, it was marked "no further action". As a result of his experiences, Professor von Zugbach—who is an author, a former Army major and a lecturer in management studies at Paisley university—is campaigning for a change in the law governing stalking. If I describe some of the incidents that he suffered, I think that hon. Members will understand why.

Mrs. von Zugbach's ordeal began in 1992 when she rejected an approach from a man she had just met. Shortly after that, in the normal course of such matters, she was bombarded with flowers and threats. It reached the point where she was receiving 100-page letters. She fled to Germany with her husband. While they were in Germany, on the anniversary of Mrs. von Zugbach's first meeting with the harasser, Professor Zugbach's car was blown up and he was led to believe that the perpetrator was none other than the harasser. Professor von Zugbach has praised the police for their efforts, but he makes it clear that the law in Scotland appears inadequate to deal with cases of alleged stalking. He said:

"I used to agree that the breach of the peace laws were sufficient to deal with the problem, but now I realise this is not true".

A major problem with breach of the peace law relates to the nature of the sentences passed. In many cases, severe custodial sentences are required not only as a deterrence but in order to stop someone who will not take no for an answer. However, of the breach of the peace cases that have appeared before Scottish courts in recent years, only 6 per cent. led to custodial sentences. Only two cases appeared before the High Court—the most solemn court, where more significant sentences may be handed down. It is unfortunate that those who suffer harassment and stalking cannot take comfort from the knowledge that their perpetrator will receive a severe sentence.

Like many Scots, I am proud of the nature of the Scottish legal system. However, there is a danger of making breach of the peace a catch-all offence, which is too diverse and lacking in specifics. Similar arguments were advanced when hon. Members discussed the need to introduce vandalism legislation and, as a consequence, it was declared a separate offence.

The many people in Scotland who suffer from harassment are entitled to be reassured that there will be a separate criminal offence that carries clear and distinctive sentences to act as a deterrent and a punishment. That view was put many times by my hon. Friends long before I entered the House. It has been put more widely in the Scottish community, by the police, victims and lawyers involved in such cases.

I urge the Government to accept the amendment. Notwithstanding the pressures to get the Bill through as quickly as possible, the Opposition feel sufficiently strongly about this matter to put the amendment to the vote. I urge the Minister of State to take into account the wide range of opinion in Scotland. This unpleasant and heinous crime should be dealt with seriously so as to make the job of the police much easier, and a more clearly prescribed sentence should be available.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth and Kinross): I am a little concerned about the amendment, not because I disagree with the sentiments that have been expressed, but because I wonder whether it is absolutely necessary.

I want to make a few points about breach of the peace generally. At the moment, the definition of a breach of the peace is wide and flexible. People in Scotland can be charged for harassment and stalking under the category of a breach of the peace.

The hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) is right to say that there is a big problem with the general public's perception of the seriousness with which the matter is being dealt with. The difficulty is that a breach of the peace can, in theory, encompass serious as well as minor incidents. However, in practice, the approach has been to charge people who have committed minor incidents with a breach of the peace, so it is perceived as a minor offence. That is unfortunate, although it could be changed within the terms of existing law. It would require some discussion between those concerned, the Crown Office and the bench to avoid a breach of the peace being merely a bit of shouting and arguing on the street corner, which I suspect is what most people think of as a breach of the peace.

That matter was discussed in the Standing Committee considering the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Bill. A new clause was discussed and subsequently withdrawn. I would have been slightly happier with that new clause, because it was more detailed, related directly to Scotland and was not simply tacked on in this fashion.

As the Minister may remember, in that debate in Committee, I expressed my reservation about a breach of the peace. I realise that I may have to repeat some of what I said in Committee. When an individual is convicted, the judge has before him or her a schedule of previous convictions. The judge will consider those convictions before coming to a view on an appropriate disposal—I suspect that that happens in most cases. The difficulty with a breach of the peace is that it only ever shows as that: there is no specification on the schedule that would alert the judge to conduct that may have begun to develop. That is one of the biggest drawbacks.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I followed up that matter with the Lord Advocate. He has confirmed that it should be possible to include "harassment" in brackets after "breach of the peace" in the schedule of previous convictions. He is actively considering that possibility with a view to implementing it. I shall say more about that later. The hon. Lady's point has been acted on, and is being considered urgently.

Ms Cunningham: I am grateful to the Minister for that statement. That will help enormously. One of the difficulties with harassment is that it can be a number of apparently trivial incidents that together cause the problem. If that change were made to the existing practice and procedure, it would make a very big difference. It needs no change in the law to achieve that, but it will allow a judge to assess that crime more seriously. I look forward to hearing from the Minister when that change will take place. In view of his statement, I shall cut short my remarks.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): The motive behind the amendment is entirely proper. I do not consider it a wrecking amendment, and if that was said, it was a wholly misplaced comment. However, having spent a little time examining the history of the law of breach of the peace and the current law as presently stated in the most recent codification of the laws of Scotland, I have come reluctantly but firmly to the view that the amendment is misplaced.

When the hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) spoke about breach of the peace, she failed to understand the flexibility of the law in Scotland on common law crime, and the extent to which it has developed since its original 18th or early 19th-century formulation. The basis for the use of the crime of a breach of the peace is to allow sufficient flexibility to deal with a range of situations that have as their consequence the alarm or distress of a number of people or of an individual. I suspect that the problems that the hon. Lady outlined so eloquently are related not to the nature or state of the law, but to the willingness of the police or the procurator fiscal to take proceedings against individuals.

We should also bear in mind the fact that, if we create a such a crime, it will be established only by the use of corroborated evidence. The hon. Lady said that some people may have recourse to an interim interdict. There are good and understandable reasons for that. First, an interim interdict can be obtained before a judge literally at half an hour's notice.

Secondly, it can be obtained on the basis of ex parte statements—the legal representative appears on behalf of the pursuer. I am hopeful that we may at last educate some Conservative Members—the "pursuer" in Scotland is the term used for the person whom they call the "plaintiff". This is supposed to be the United Kingdom, but I am deeply disappointed that some of the Government's Back-Bench Members are not so immersed in the unity of the kingdom that they understand even the most basic terms used in Scottish law.

The representative of the pursuer, by stating a sufficiently forceful case, can obtain an interim interdict. Indeed, it can be obtained outwith the presence of the person against whom it is directed. Furthermore, any breach of an interdict—whether interim or permanent—is a contempt of court, and is capable of being dealt with by fine or imprisonment.

The Minister will recall that we changed the civil evidence rules in Scotland in 1990 when we removed the requirement for corroboration in civil cases. An interim interdict can be obtained on the basis of an ex parte statement at half an hour's notice and without the need for corroboration. It is not surprising that, faced with an urgent case, one adopts that route rather than attempting to invoke the use of the police and a prosecution, because that requires investigation, arrest, appearance in court, committal for trial and all the procedures that follow thereon. There is therefore something to be said for interim interdict.

In two cases—Montgomery v. McLeod 1977, with which I am sure the Minister is more than familiar, and Young v. Heatley 1959—the breadth of the application of the existing crime of breach of the peace is set out succinctly. The former states:

> "There is no limit to the kind of conduct which may give rise to a charge of breach of the peace. All that is required is that there must be some conduct such as to excite the reasonable apprehension to which we have drawn attention, or such as to create disturbance and alarm to the lieges in fact".

The language is somewhat Victorian; a liege is simply a citizen.

According to the latter case:

> "Breach of the peace, however, is an offence the limits of which have never been sharply defined. It is so largely in each case a question of circumstances and of degree".

In the course of my researches, I encountered a further case, which, unhappily, is not reported. I refer to Mackie v. McLeod 1961, with which the Minister may also be familiar. The circumstances are interesting. The accused person became infatuated with a young woman whom he hardly knew, and formed the habit of waiting outside her place of employment, looking at her and then following her and her fiancé for some part of their time together. He was convicted of breach of the peace. An appeal was taken, on the grounds that the facts disclosed in the evidence did not justify the conviction, but the conviction was upheld by the High Court. That may not be the most extreme instance of stalking, but it seems to me to contain substantially the elements of stalking, and I consider it a clear indication that the law has been seen to be adequate to deal with the problem.

As for bail and the particular case to which the hon. Member for Monklands, East referred, it would have been open to the judge in granting bail—I am surprised that this did not happen—to make it a condition of bail that the person granted it did not go back to live next door to the alleged victim. If that condition had been applied and had then been breached, the individual could have been brought back to court, bail could have been revoked and he could have been kept on remand in prison until such time as it was appropriate to deal with his case.

What is significant is not the state of the law but the state of willingness of those responsible for the administration of the law—the police in the first instance, and the procurator fiscal service in the second. That lies at the heart of some of the difficulties outlined by the hon. Lady.

I fear that, if the amendment were passed, it might achieve the opposite of what is intended. At present, if charges are brought under the crime of breach of the peace, there is a degree of flexibility and discretion. Indeed, some argue that the degree of discretion is too great, but that is not an argument that we are considering today. If the crime of harassment is created in Scotland, there may well be cases in which the borderline is drawn in such a way that a person who would otherwise be convicted of breach of the peace will be acquitted of harassment.

Although the hon. Lady's motive is not to be challenged in any way, and despite her obvious concern and the time and trouble that she took in preparing her speech, she has not appreciated the precise nature of the crime of breach of the peace in Scottish law. If the amendment were accepted, it might actually make the conviction of those guilty of harassment more difficult than it is in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) made an excellent speech. It is a few years since I acted as his junior counsel in a murder case, which he conducted admirably. I agree with everything that he said. He was right to say that the motive of the hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) is good. I have great sympathy with her purpose, but I do not think that amendment No. 27 is the best means of achieving it.

The amendment is unnecessary. In Scotland, any conduct that causes or is likely to cause alarm, annoyance or upset will always be criminal, as the common law offence of breach of the peace. Watching someone, following that person, sending unwanted letters or gifts or attempting to contact the person in any way can give rise to a charge of breach of the peace if the target of such conduct is alarmed, annoyed or upset by it. No statutory offence of harassment is needed.

Breach of the peace is broad and flexible as an offence. Indeed, it is certainly as wide as the lower-level harassment offence that the hon. Lady now seeks to introduce in Scotland. As a common law offence, it incurs a maximum penalty of life imprisonment following a conviction or indictment in the High Court. The creation of statutory offences with statutory minimum penalties will not enable stalking to be dealt with either more effectively or more severely than it is already dealt with in Scotland. No changes are required to Scottish criminal law in that regard.

5.15 pm

Like the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East, I would be concerned about the effect of the amendment on the structure of the criminal law in Scotland. The lower-level offence and the higher-level offence of putting people in fear of violence are part of a package for England and Wales. Importing the lower-level offence to Scotland would result in prosecutions for less serious conduct being brought under the statutory offence, but where more serious conduct was involved, prosecution would have to be brought under the common law. The lower-level offence would be triable summarily, and would involve a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment.

In the debate on the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Bill, the Opposition agreed that the sentencing powers of the sheriff summary court should be increased to allow six months' imprisonment. The lower-level offence would fall squarely within the sheriffs' summary jurisdiction. Its introduction would therefore not result in harassments being taken more seriously, or in the imposition of tougher sentences.

The Bill does not make any changes in Scottish criminal law, because there is no need to do so. The existing law works. In Scotland, any conduct that causes alarm can be dealt with as a breach of the peace. Sentences are at the discretion of the court, but the maximum available penalties for breach of the peace are much greater than those proposed for a statutory offence. Nothing would be gained by creating such an offence.

Stalking is rightly taken very seriously. A circular was issued by the Crown Office to all procurators fiscal to re-emphasise the Lord Advocate's concern that cases of alleged stalking should be accorded priority. It said that careful consideration should be given to the court venue, so that cases are brought on indictment if appropriate, and that all offending behaviour should be libelled, not just the most recent incident.

Breach of the peace is a wide-ranging offence, and that has great advantages. It deals with the most minor offences, which would not warrant custodial sentences, but would also tackle the most serious examples of alarming conduct. Custodial sentences are imposed. In a three-year period between 1992 and 1994, 3,063 people received such sentences for breach of the peace. That shows that it is certainly not a trivial offence for which everyone gets just a slap on the wrist.

The hon. Lady raised the Durie case. I cannot agree with her suggestion that the existence of a statutory offence would have resulted in that case being treated more seriously. Summary proceedings were taken, which meant that the sheriff could impose up to three months' imprisonment. Once the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Bill is enacted, that will increase to six months—the same maximum penalty as for the lower-level harassment offence. Since the Durie case, new powers have come into existence for the Lord Advocate to appeal against sentences that are too lenient.

The hon. Member for Perth and Kinross (Ms Cunningham) raised an important point in the Committee stage of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Bill about persons who had a history of harassment that was not shown adequately in a schedule of previous convictions. I told her that I would follow that up with the Lord Advocate. It should be possible to record such a conviction as a breach of the peace, with "harassment" added in brackets. I understand that there are precedents for that: "theft" can have "shoplifting" added in brackets after it, so that, if someone is continually involved in shoplifting, that will be picked up. It should be possible to note that harassment has been involved in breach of the peace offences so that appropriate disposals will be made in the event of a long history of offending.

I applaud the aim of the hon. Member for Monklands, East but in all respects the offence of breach of the peace is adequate to deal with stalking and harassment, and I must resist her amendment.

Mrs. Liddell: I am sorry that the Minister does not see fit to accept the amendment. One of the great advantages of being a Member of the House is that we are enabled as taxpayers to get the benefit of distinguished legal advice free of charge. I greatly appreciate the remarks by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell).

The Minister did not refer to the fact that there is a blurring between the use of civil and criminal remedies in the existing legislation. Without a clearly defined criminal offence, women and others who suffer from harassment will have to have recourse to the civil remedy. The cost of doing that and the crisis in civil legal aid could greatly inhibit opportunities to achieve redress. While I do not wish unnecessarily to delay the Committee, I should like the amendment to be put to the vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. As it now appears that British personnel are involved in the siege in Lima, and following what Madam

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Speaker said about my point of order earlier today, may I ask yet again whether there has been any hint from the Foreign Office that it will make a statement?

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Certainly the occupant of the Chair has not been informed of any intention to make a statement now.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): I beg to move amendment No. 43, in page 7, line 12, after 'Act' insert

'(except section (Corresponding provision for Northern Ireland))'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government new clause 2—Corresponding provision for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Kirkhope: The consultation period on the paper "Stalking in Northern Ireland" ended on 2 December. I am sure that hon. Members will be pleased to know that, as all responses broadly supported the introduction of legislation, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to extend the Bill to Northern Ireland.

There are differences between the current criminal and civil legislation for England and Wales and for Northern Ireland, and the new clause therefore permits the Bill's replication in Northern Ireland by negative resolution. If legislation were to be by affirmative resolution, there would for some time be a gap in the legislation between the jurisdictions, for which, given the vulnerability of the victims that the Bill is designed to protect, we might be criticised. New clause 2 puts into effect the request by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland that the Bill be replicated for Northern Ireland under the negative resolution procedure.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I appreciate the Minister's words in introducing the amendment. We have had the time since the Loyal Address to refer to the fact that we believe that the Bill should be extended to Northern Ireland. I understand some of the difficulties in legislating for other parts of the kingdom, which were obvious in the debate on amendment No. 27, and I also understand that there are people in Northern Ireland who keep telling us that the differences in legislation make it difficult to do so, but they do not make it impossible. I appreciate that steps have been taken to fill that gap so that we might go forward fairly quickly together.

Mr. Kirkhope: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. I am sure that he was involved in the consultation on "Stalking in Northern Ireland" and that he and his colleagues will be pleased. We are, of course, delighted to do what we can to make the Bill applicable there.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 13, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 14 and 15 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New clause 2

CORRESPONDING PROVISION FOR NORTHERN IRELAND

'. An Order in Council made under paragraph 1(1)(b) of Schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 1974 which contains a statement that it is made only for purposes corresponding to those of sections 1 to 7 and 12 of this Act—

(a) shall not be subject to sub-paragraphs (4) and (5) of paragraph 1 of that Schedule (affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament), but

(b) shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament'.— [Mr. Maclean.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 1

POWERS OF COURT TO PROTECT VICTIMS DURING TRIALS

'. In any proceedings under this Act, where it appears to the court that distress is being caused to any person who may have been the victim of any act of harassment to which this Act applies by reason of the decision of the person accused of that act of harassment to represent himself in those proceedings, it may require the person accused of the act of harassment to be legally represented.'.— [Ms Janet Anderson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Ms Janet Anderson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause's purpose is to highlight a problem about which the Minister and I have corresponded. It concerns the arrangements for defendants to cross-examine witnesses in person.

Recently, two cases aroused particular public concern. The first involved Julia Mason, who was cross-examined for six days by the man who was eventually found guilty of raping her.

The second case was that of Margaret Bent, to whom I have already referred. Margaret was cross-examined by her alleged stalker, Dennis Chambers. At the time of the case, the National Association of Victim Support Schemes called for the victims of domestic or sexual violence or similar cases to have the right not to be examined by the accused. In view of what happened to Margaret Bent, I should be grateful if the Minister would give us a progress report on the deliberations in which I know that his Department is engaged.

Mr. Maclean: The new clause would give the court discretion in any proceedings under the Act to require a person accused of an act of harassment to be legally represented if it appears to the court that distress is caused to the victim of that harassment by reason of the accused representing himself.

The Government recognise that serious concerns have arisen from the recent cases in which victims of rape and stalking offences have been caused enormous distress by being cross-examined by defendants who are not legally represented and who appear to take the opportunity during the cross-examination to make the victims relive some of the horrendous experiences they have endured. We find that unacceptable. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary announced in a speech in October that he was determined to ensure that it was prevented. A review of the law covering this matter is under way.

Depriving a defendant of the right to represent himself if he chooses to do so is a serious matter, and there are some complex issues to consider carefully, including the range of offences to which such measures might apply. Confining it to proceedings relating to harassment alone, which is what the new clause would do, would not meet the concerns of one of the rape victims about whom we heard earlier and would not cover the case that gave rise to the most concern. There are also other serious offences to which this provision would sensibly apply.

Mr. Bennett: Can the Minister tell us the timetable for the review?

Mr. Maclean: No, I cannot. The review is being conducted as speedily as possible. I have not set an artificial time scale, but we want the answers as soon as possible. It is not an easy thing to do. The mischief—I use that word in its technical legal sense—or the evil, which is a more colloquial word, caused by the comments and behaviour of those representing themselves is a complex thing to try to prevent. The damage that we want to prevent is simple to describe, as is the concept, but the practical issues are tricky.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): I can well understand that depriving a defendant of the opportunity to be represented at all would be a very serious matter. However, many people within and outside the House of Commons would think that to tell a defendant that he must be represented by a lawyer would not be such a serious deprivation and would not outweigh the right of the complainant not to be subjected to the indignity that the two unfortunate women to whom the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) referred had to endure.

Mr. Maclean: I have heard my hon. Friend's point of view; he is experienced in these matters. If we propose taking away the right of defendants to represent themselves, we have to be careful how we do it, in what cases we do it and where we draw the line. It could be a slippery slope towards removing the right of defendants to represent themselves in quite the wrong cases.

When we reach our preliminary conclusions, we will discuss them with the Law Society and the Bar Council, but we are not at that stage yet. We wish to make progress as quickly as possible. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I and all right-thinking people were appalled at the way in which one defendant in particular behaved in the rape cross-examination. We would all like to stamp out such mischief, overnight if possible, but as I have said, this is a complex area of law.

We fully understand the concerns that lie behind the new clause. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) intends to insist that this should be built into the Bill for harassment only. When we find a solution to the problem, we want it to apply to a sensible and coherent range of measures. There may be a range of offences where we would want to make some changes, if we conclude that change is possible and can be done sensibly.

I hope that the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen will withdraw the motion and accept my assurance that the Government wish to move as speedily as possible. We want to reach a sensible conclusion, which, we hope, will be acceptable to most of those in the profession and the judiciary, which will not infringe anyone's rights or take away justice and which victims will find bearable.

5.45 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The Minister's account of these matters is well judged and appropriate. If one is to innovate on the constitutional right of any individual to defend himself or herself, one must be certain that it is entirely justified. I have not had the benefit of reading the transcripts of the two trials to which reference was made. However, in my experience, which is perhaps becoming increasingly outdated and is confined to Scotland, any effort at repetitious or offensive cross-examination from an individual defending himself or herself was almost always dealt with extremely severely by the judge. The point at which it becomes offensive is a fine judgment to make, but, for most people, the offensive nature of the two cases to which we have referred must have been evident to all who were participating. I am a little surprised that the judges did not feel able to take what one might regard as a firmer hand.

Mr. Maclean: It may help the hon. and learned Gentleman if I tell him that reading the transcript would not give a full account of the offensiveness. In one case, the defendant wore identical clothes to those he wore during the rape and deported himself in a similar way. The transcript does not give the full picture of the evil that he was committing in the court.

Mr. Campbell: There is no substitute for being present in the case. One often reads reports of cases in which one has been involved which seem to bear little resemblance to reality. I accept that there is a problem, and my only question is why a firmer hand was not taken. Perhaps the Lord Chancellor should issue some clearer directives on what is permissible.

Mr. Stephen rose—

Mr. Campbell: I must make progress, because I know that the Committee is of that mind.

There are some instances in which the accused commences the case being represented but, as the case progresses, it becomes impossible for his or her legal representatives to continue, either because the nature of the instructions changes dramatically and puts the professional position of the legal representative in jeopardy or because the instructions change so as to suggest an approach that does not amount to a defence in law. If legal representatives have withdrawn, it might be difficult to force the appointment of other legal representatives, who might find themselves faced with the same problem.

There might be almost a pantomime: the case would be adjourned so that fresh counsel could be instructed and that fresh counsel would turn up the following morning saying, "We have had a consultation with the accused, but, unfortunately, we are unable to represent him." Such circumstances could bedevil proceedings in a way that would not add to the dignity of the court.

[Mr. Campbell]

There are complicated issues involved in not just the constitutional principle but the practicality of making a rule such as that proposed in the new clause. I hope that the motion is not pressed to a Division, because I do not believe that, in the present state of our knowledge and the consultation, we would be able to reach an informed decision.

Mr. Stephen: The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) mentioned cases in which judges deal quickly and decisively with defendants who represent themselves and break the rules of procedure. Like him, I have some experience in the courts, and I fear that, in many such cases, judges are reluctant to interfere with the conduct of a defence by a defendant in person lest that be used as a ground of appeal leading to a subsequent hearing in the Court of Appeal.

On the hon. and learned Gentleman's other point—if the defendant were to run a defence that is not a defence in law—there is no more reason for allowing him to run that defence in person than if he were represented by a lawyer.

Ms Janet Anderson: This is obviously a very difficult issue, and we have no intention of pressing the motion to a Division—although I am grateful for having had the opportunity to air the subject. I am also grateful to the Minister for his concern about the problem. We are thankful that his Department is conducting its review, and we look forward to a speedy response. We hope that it will be possible to do something to end the type of problem experienced by those women.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill, as amended, to be reported.

Order for Third Reading read.

5.51 pm

Mr. Maclean: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said in yesterday's debate on Second Reading that the Bill had one simple aim: to protect the victims of harassment. The Bill aims to give that protection, not by defining activities that are known as stalking—as we believe that such a definition will inevitably omit some activities that are distressing, or worse, to victims—but by focusing on the harm inflicted on the victim. That harm is harassment. The benefits of proceeding in such a manner are that all forms of harassment—whether stalking, racial abuse, neighbour or work disputes—are covered.

As I listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell), I was tempted to say that I wish that I had the benefit in England of Scotland's breach of the peace provisions, about which I learned many years ago.

The Bill adopts a twin-track approach by using the civil and criminal law, both of which have a part to play in providing effective remedies to combat harassment. The new concept of a restraining order that will be available to criminal courts on conviction is a major step forward and has been welcomed by those campaigning on the issue.

The Opposition agreed to co-operate with the Government to pass the Bill without delay. We have made some good progress today, and I am delighted with the support and assistance that we have received today. It is a matter of regret that we got a bit bogged down yesterday and that the Bill was amended in a manner that is unacceptable to the Government and absolutely unworkable in practice. We will have to take a little time in another place to put the Bill back on the straight and narrow.

Sentencing is a matter for the criminal courts, and conditions of treatment attached to sentences are a matter for them. We believe that they have ample powers to order treatment, which might be probation, intensive therapy or counselling. I believe that counselling is of value only when it is entered into voluntarily and willingly. People seek counselling, but they cannot be forced into it. Moreover, civil courts do not sentence people at all but are a forum for the resolution of disputes. However, that issue can be addressed in another place.

Mr. George Howarth: The Minister said that counselling is effective only if it is undertaken on a voluntary basis. He should examine some of the programmes for prisoners run by the Prison Service. Prisoners are required to attend those programmes, which often achieve very good results among those who have attended on a non-voluntary basis.

Mr. Maclean: We do not want to get into that debate now; I merely say that there is a world of difference between the situation that the hon. Gentleman describes and prisoners whose entitlement to parole or early release depends on their participating in the prison regime and other activities, such as drying out from drug dependency. Technically, attending such a programme in prison may be voluntary, but prisoners believe that, if they do not attend, they will not be granted parole. There is a sanction in prison that will not be replicated in the outside world, particularly through civil courts. However, let us not discuss that issue on Third Reading.

We will continue to place the safety and protection of the British people at the top of our agenda for action. The Bill is one of a number of measures that the Government have recently introduced in the House or in another place that, when enacted, will make the United Kingdom a safer and a better place in which to live. As I said earlier, I have no wish to delay the Bill further. The Government have set out clearly our objections to the Opposition's amendment, and we have stated our intention to put the Bill right in the other place. Victims of stalking and of other forms of harassment should not have their hopes of protection put at risk by any further delay or unnecessary amendments to the Bill.

I believe that the Bill will provide victims of harassment with the protection that they need. The Bill's provisions strike the right balance between the need to give reassurance and protection to victims and the need not to constrain legitimate activity, whether it is the action of journalists, private investigators, debt collectors or, of course, politicians.

With the caveat that I have mentioned, I commend this excellent Bill to the House.

5.55 pm

Ms Janet Anderson: The Opposition had always intended to be fully co-operative on the Bill, because, like the Minister and Conservative Members, we recognise the need to bring relief to the victims of stalking as quickly as possible. The intention of our amendments, therefore—despite what some hon. Members may think—was not to obstruct. I should tell the Minister that, had we intended to be obstructive, we would have pushed our definition to a Division. We chose not to do so, because we wanted to facilitate the Bill's passage. The Suzy Lamplugh Trust agreed that our amendments were intended to improve the Bill, and that was their intention.

As the Minister has mentioned yesterday's events, I should mention the reason for what we did. Criminal courts already have powers—which have been confirmed and backed by the Government—to provide counselling to confront offenders' criminal behaviour. However, as the Bill is drafted, that power would arise only when an injunction was breached—when a defendant resumed his stalking—and would be dealt with only by applying the much higher burden of proof of beyond reasonable doubt. As we know, many stalkers are obsessive, and firm action to confront their offending behaviour may have to be taken as quickly as possible. The threat of imprisonment is also necessary if victims are to be properly protected.

That is why, last night, the Opposition moved amendment No. 13, to provide county courts with power to order counselling when making an anti-stalking injunction. In moving the amendment, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) said:

"We mean not some pleasant chat over a cup of tea . . . but the sort of counselling that forces offenders to face up to their offending behaviour".—[Official Report, 17 December 1996; Vol. 287, c. 838.]

The Minister claimed in his speech that our amendments were unworkable. I refer him to the leader page of tonight's Evening Standard, which rightly states:

"Tony Blair, promised to cooperate with the Home Secretary in getting"

the Bill

"through the House without delay", and that the Home Secretary

"is now accusing Labour of going back on its word by putting up amendments to the Bill which would clarify what it means by harassment."

The Evening Standard goes on to say that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Labour counterpart

"is right to insist on scrutiny. Mr. Howard's Bill, like so much of the legislation which has emerged from the Home Office during his tenure, shows signs of clumsy and over-hasty drafting."

I hope that the Minister will accept that we tabled our amendments with the best of intentions, and we hope that Ministers will give them—particularly the amendment that the House passed last night—serious consideration.

Having said that, we wish the Bill well and a speedy passage through the other place. I am sure that the thousands of victims of stalking, and those in other categories whom the Minister claims the measures will help—such as those in neighbour or racial disputes—will be greatly relieved when it reaches the statute book.

5.59 pm

Mr. Bennett: I, too, hope that the Bill turns out to be a good one, but I have to put down certain markers. I fear that, with the Government not prepared to commit any new resources, the legislation may not be enforced as effectively as the House would like. It is not reasonable to expect the police to be able to give the necessary time and attention to harassment cases in particular without there being resourcing implications. We should be worried about passing legislation without providing the necessary resources.

We should also ask whether the House did a proper job of scrutiny. I fear that we shall find that the Bill does not protect all those whom we want to protect. We may well find that one or two people whom we did not intend to be caught by the legislation will be. The lessons for the House must be that, although all-party co-operation is a good idea, it should not shorten proper scrutiny. I do not think that the Floor of the House is the proper place for detailed scrutiny. Even though we were trying to get the measure through House quickly, it would have been far better to send the Bill to a Standing Committee, even if the Committee had had to sit for long hours to carry out the scrutiny effectively. I hope that the legislation works, but, when the House looks back on this day and a half, I do not think that we will believe that we carried out our scrutiny role effectively.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third Time, and passed.

National Heritage Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

6.1 pm

The Minister of State, Department of National Heritage (Mr. Iain Sproat): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill extends the powers of the trustees of the national heritage memorial fund on the projects that they can fund and the recipients eligible for funding.

As the House will know, the NHMF trustees distribute the heritage share of the national lottery proceeds. Our aim is to build on the existing success of the lottery as a source of funding for the national heritage. We are keen that everyone should be able to appreciate and benefit from that heritage. We want lottery money to be used to enhance opportunities for people—especially the young—to have ready access to our heritage, to learn about it and to enjoy it. We also want to ensure that any worthwhile heritage project can be considered for lottery funding, with no artificial barriers.

Under the existing legislation, which predates the advent of the lottery, the NHMF trustees can fund only those projects that involve the acquisition, maintenance or preservation of tangible heritage assets. Of course, that gives the NHMF plenty of scope to support worthwhile projects, and it is taking full advantage of those opportunities.

However, because of the current terms of the legislation, the NHMF's role as a lottery distributor is more restricted than the Government and the trustees wish. The NHMF cannot, for instance, offer funds for projects that promote access to our heritage or enhance understanding and enjoyment of it. It cannot assist in the development of heritage skills, and is limited in its ability to support nature conservation work.

We want to lift those constraints. We want the NHMF to back heritage projects comparable with those that other lottery distributors are supporting in their sectors.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Minister be specific about the inhibitions on undertaking conservation work? My understanding is that the national heritage memorial fund has been very good about supporting New Hailes, near Edinburgh, which is really a conservation project.

Mr. Sproat: Perhaps I could come back to the hon. Gentleman on that project. The fund exists mainly to acquire, preserve and maintain tangible objects. Conservation can be part of preservation, therefore falling within the fund's current remit, but the NHMF trustees have been uneasy about any project that strays too far from the acquisition, preservation and maintenance of tangible objects. However, I shall look into the New Hailes example and see exactly how it was dealt with.

The choice of projects is, of course, a matter for the NHMF trustees. However, the trustees and the Government are clear that our heritage offers ample scope for the NHMF to undertake a wider role than is at present legally possible.

Projects that the trustees might want to consider funding could include the assignment of a professional educationist to a heritage site to train staff and produce material for use by school parties, the use of information technology to develop a virtual reality programme showing how a cathedral developed over time, or a training scheme for a heritage-related skill—be it stained glass conservation or hedge laying.

We also want the NHMF to be able to support projects that enhance understanding of our national history or landscape, independently of its tangible remains.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Together with other members of the Environment Select Committee, I visited the natural history museum this morning. The nation can be justly proud of the enormous collection held there—the largest in the world—of specimens from the natural world, and of the high-quality scientific research that goes on there. We were shown the efforts made by the museum to put its specimens on computer disk, and to make its collection available to all the scientists in the world through the Internet. I am sure that the museum will welcome my hon. Friend's comments about the availability of money for information technology projects.

Mr. Sproat: I am glad that my hon. Friend visited the natural history museum, which is one of the finest natural history museums in the world, if not the finest. Anyone who has not discovered how many angles a beetle can be seen from with information technology would not believe it. The natural history museum is far advanced in such matters. I am sure that other museums will take up similar technology in a major way.

Sir Wyn Roberts (Conwy): Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Bill will enable the Victoria County History of England, which is a national project, to apply for lottery funding?

Mr. Sproat: I shall come to that in just a second. You yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, played an important role in that project. I shall deal with it in a few sentences. I ask my right hon. Friend to contain himself.

We have identified three types of project that fulfil the purpose that I mentioned. The first is an exhibition on a particular aspect of our history. Examples might be a museum exhibition on the life and work of an important figure in history or on the ecology of a particular region. The second is the creation of an archive—for instance, an oral record of the distinctive experiences of particular localities or groups. The third—this was identified during the Bill's passage through another place—is a major work of reference such as the Victoria County History.

The answer to my right hon. Friend is yes. I want to pay particular tribute to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if that is not a creepy thing to do, because your great work and valuable advice enabled us to include the project in the Bill. All those who value the county histories pay great credit to your work.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Perhaps I should declare an interest, because my hon. Friend probably does not know that, together with Denis Mahon and others, I drafted the National Heritage Act 1980, which led to this Bill. Having read the Bill, I congratulate the Minister on it. We are now moving the national heritage memorial fund towards history and school projects, to enable people to relate the written word to our history and monuments. The Bill is tremendous, and the Minister deserves every conceivable congratulation on it.

Mr. Sproat: This is a big evening for congratulations. I thank my hon. Friend for his. It is a tribute to his original work on the 1980 Act that the new Bill is so short. He deserves credit for that.

The first of the Bill's two main elements is the opening up of the NHMF's statutory terms of reference to embrace a much wider range of worthwhile heritage projects. The second element concerns who is eligible for assistance from the NHMF. Existing legislation permits the NHMF to offer financial assistance only to public and charitable bodies that have been established for a specific heritage purpose.

That remit, of course, takes in much that is at the very heart of our heritage, but it rules out a great many potentially worthwhile projects. In built heritage alone, more than two thirds of historic buildings are privately owned. As the law stands, those buildings are outside the NHMF's terms of reference and therefore cannot be considered for lottery funding.

When the National Heritage Committee examined the national lottery earlier this year, the NHMF, English Heritage and other bodies all argued that limiting eligibility for lottery funding in such a way works against the best interests of heritage, and that the restrictions on eligibility should therefore be removed. The Select Committee agreed with that view, and so do the Government. We believe that ownership of property should not determine whether a project is eligible for lottery support. What matters is whether the project has heritage merit and will be for the public good.

There have been suggestions that the purpose of the proposal is simply to enable lottery money to reach the owners of historic country houses, but privately owned heritage includes buildings of almost every kind. There is considerable scope for the lottery to support heritage projects, such as historic townscape schemes as an element of urban regeneration, or conservation projects in the countryside. A number of such projects have already received lottery awards, but the NHMF has often been unable to help because much of the property concerned is privately owned.

Nor, of course, is the proposal confined to historic buildings. The new approach to eligibility will also apply, for example, to museums, land and artefacts owned by private individuals. There is of course nothing new about making public funds available for the benefit of privately owned heritage property. For many years, English Heritage and other bodies have been running grant schemes for historic buildings of outstanding quality, irrespective of ownership. Grants are subject, quite properly, to stringent conditions on matters such as public access, and there is provision for the means testing of applicants and for clawback of funds if necessary. The NHMF trustees accept that, if lottery grants are to be given to private owners of heritage property, such rigorous safeguards will be required.

There has also been concern that the Government's aim in extending the NHMF's funding remit is to enable lottery money to replace core funding for heritage, thus going back on our undertaking that lottery money would be additional to existing expenditure programmes. The immediate response to such concern is to point to the extremely favourable public expenditure settlement that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has achieved for heritage bodies in the next financial year.

Museums and galleries, for instance, have been granted an additional £3 million over previous plans. An additional £1.8 million will be available to English Heritage. Those figures testify to the Government's determination to protect core funding in priority areas of heritage.

Mr. Dalyell: The Minister will know of the British museum's concern about the terrible dilemma of either paying off staff or being faced with charging for entrance, which for very good reasons they are exceedingly reluctant to undertake. Can he really be so complacent about the position?

Mr. Sproat: Not a tremor of complacency had entered my voice on the matter. The devastating report on the finances, organisation, management and general efficiency of the British museum came not from the Government but from an independent report that was commissioned by the trustees. It was in that report that the suggestion was made that imposing entry charges was one way in which to make up the shortfall that arose from—not to put it too disagreeably—the not wholly adequate running of the finances and organisation of the British museum in past years. The Government did not say that. The Government do not encourage or discourage charging.

Some museums, such as the British museum, do not charge, but others, such as the natural history museum, which my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) visited today, the science museum, the imperial war museum and the maritime museum not only charge but are extremely glad that they have done so.

If the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) talked to Sir Neil Cossons, Neil Chalmers or Robert Crawford, or went to the maritime museum, he would find that they very much wish to keep a charging policy. That is up to them, just as it is up to the British museum's trustees to decide whether they want to charge. They have not looked after the finances as well as they might have liked, and if they can find another way in which to put finances back on a sound basis without going in for charging, that is fine; so be it. No pressure will come from the Government.

It would be interesting to know whether, if they were ever in power, the Opposition intend to abolish such charges, and if so, where they would get the money to make up for the charges that currently help the science museum, the natural history museum, the maritime museum, the imperial war museum, and so on.

The Government stand by our undertaking that lottery money will not replace existing funding. That of course does not mean that, in areas where lottery funding is available, expenditure programmes are immune from the constraints applying to public spending generally. Nor does it prevent lottery money from complementing other funding. In the heritage sector, it is entirely right that projects that are beyond the scope of English Heritage's grant programmes, generous as that is—in terms of either eligibility or affordability—should be able to be considered for lottery funding.

What is important is that there should be agreed strategies on the role of the lottery in relation to other heritage programmes, so that the available funds can be applied where they are needed. With that in mind, the NHMF is having discussions with English Heritage and other bodies on future funding priorities in the light of the new powers conferred by the Bill.

I turn to the Bill's specific provisions. Clause 1 redefines the funding powers of the NHMF trustees, as set out in section 3 of the National Heritage Act 1980, which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) helped to draft. There are three main changes. First, the NHMF's remit is extended beyond simply the acquisition, maintenance or preservation of land, buildings or objects of importance to national heritage. Under the Bill, the NHMF will also be able to support projects that encourage study, understanding and enjoyment of heritage, promote access to heritage, or develop skills relating to heritage.

Secondly, there is a new power for the NHMF to fund specified types of project which relate to important aspects of the United Kingdom's history, natural history or landscape, and which the trustees consider are of public benefit. That power encompasses exhibitions, archives and comprehensive works of reference, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) referred.

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): All over the country in the 1920s, war memorials were erected by public subscription. Some of them belong to local authorities, and many are onerous burdens. Will the Bill enable those war memorials to be looked after properly, providing, of course, that the correct procedures are followed?

Mr. Sproat: I hope so. My hon. Friend raises a very important point, which we shall perhaps be able to go into in rather more depth in Committee when we consider particular examples.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow mentioned New Hailes. The NHMF has been able to support the acquisition of New Hailes by the National Trust for Scotland, because the National Trust is a public body. If the present owner of New Hailes had sought help from the NHMF for repairs to the building—the hon. Gentleman mentioned conservation, which might just fall under the remit of repairs, I suppose—she would not have been able to receive funding. It is in part to allow such added discretion for the trustees that we have introduced the Bill. It would have been possible to help New Hailes under the Bill even had it not been for the acquisition by the National Trust for Scotland.

Secondly, there is a new power for the NHMF to fund specified types of project that relate to an important aspect of the United Kingdom's history, and so on, including the comprehensive works of reference that I have already mentioned.

Thirdly, the current list of recipients eligible for NHMF funding will disappear. Instead, the NHMF will be able to support any project that the trustees consider is of importance to the national heritage and of public benefit.

Clause 2 repeals existing provisions that require the NHMF to obtain departmental and Treasury approval for the payment of allowances to trustees and for certain staffing matters. We propose to table one small amendment to clause 2, which will concern the remuneration for NHMF trustees.

It is arguable that the work involved in assessing lottery applications is approaching the point at which it becomes unreasonable to ask trustees to give their time unpaid. We do not intend to make any immediate decisions about that. However, the NHMF is virtually alone among lottery distributors in that its trustees are precluded by statute from receiving substantive remuneration. We want to take the opportunity provided by the Bill to remove the current statutory bar. The current chairman has made it clear that he would not wish to make use of the change to receive remuneration himself.

I am confident that the Bill will be welcomed by all hon. Members with an interest in our country's incomparable heritage. It will effectively bring the whole of the heritage within reach of lottery funding, it will ensure that resources are deployed where they are most needed, and it will open the door to a range of exciting new projects—projects not only to preserve the heritage but also to help deepen our understanding of it and enhance our enjoyment of it.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): We welcome the Bill, which has the Opposition's general support. Lord Donoughue, on behalf of the Opposition, made clear our support in the excellent debate in the other place. We accept the case that the Minister has made for augmenting and widening the powers of the national heritage memorial fund and the heritage lottery fund trustees so as to give greater flexibility in the operation of the two funds.

At present, those funds are circumscribed by the fact that they are charged only with acquisition, maintenance and preservation, so a lot of imaginative opportunities are being missed. The hon. Member for Calder Valley (Sir D. Thompson) made a good point about memorials, which are much loved in communities throughout the country, and constitute an extraordinary record of our history and of the sacrifices that communities have made on behalf of this country. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there is an organisation that cares for memorials, but it is hugely underfunded, and relies purely on charitable money.

It is precisely such projects that will now be eligible because of the wider powers, and we look forward to exploring that aspect of the Bill in committee. Such opportunities are being missed at present, and the Bill properly opens the possibilities for their inclusion. That is one of the reasons why we welcome it.

We are enthusiastic about some of the specific powers, especially those concerning wider access. As we understand it, matters such as the cost of transport for school groups to sites, and the pricing policy of some heritage sites, would become eligible for assistance as a result of the Bill. The educational work of schools, youth initiatives and training in heritage-related skills, perhaps by means of bursaries, will be included So will the important issue of information technology, to which the Minister alluded briefly, and which we shall explore in Committee. That will arise in connection with access to the great archives of this country and other archive material, which all have enormous potential both for academics and in schools.

We welcome all those developments, especially the widening of the definition to include conservation of our natural heritage. At present conservation of our habitats, flora and fauna receives only about 9 per cent. of national heritage memorial funding; yet our hedgerows, heaths and sedges, and the extraordinary diversity and beauty of the British landscape in general, tell us a great deal about how our forefathers lived, and how we have created what is often a man-made landscape. As a society, we have not always been as careful as we should have been about that, or given the funding to preserve those great natural and man-made landscapes, so we welcome the fact that such projects will become eligible for funding.

We should like an assurance from the Minister that wider eligibility for nature conservation will also be recognised by the NHMF—the national heritage memorial fund—and that things will be on a more equal footing generally, not only through lottery funding but in terms of the conservation of nature and the built environment in general. Problems have undoubtedly been identified, as happened with the 1995 report on biodiversity. There is a great deal of work to do.

We welcome what the Minister said about the Victoria County History, since Staffordshire, the county of which I represent a part, is an especially fine example. I join the Minister in paying tribute to those who, like your colleague, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and like many Members of the House of Lords, have pressed for the change. I am glad that the Government have responded and clarified that aspect.

We have not always been as careful as we ought to have been about our local histories and oral histories, and our industrial heritage. We welcome the fact that those will now be taken within the ambit of the two funds.

We welcome not only the widening of the powers but the fact that more bodies will be eligible. The definition of eligibility for receiving funds should range more widely than the public bodies and charities established for a heritage purpose that it covers at present. As we understand the Bill, the new definition will mean that the criteria for eligibility for applying for funds will be both the heritage importance of the project and the public good. Anybody who is doing valuable heritage work will now be eligible to apply to the two funds and to receive grants.

Of course, that will include the private sector—another area that we need to explore in Committee. We welcome the idea in principle, but we foresee certain problems, which we can examine, although not necessarily tonight. In particular, we should like to hear an assurance from the Minister, either tonight or in Committee, that, just as the private houses he mentioned will be eligible, other areas of our heritage that are in private hands will be eligible, too.

For example, there are some wonderful examples of 1930s architecture in privately owned cinemas. Whether those will fall within the remit of funding remains to be seen. What about our industrial heritage, including premises that, although they may be in use at the moment, may also be listed buildings? There are many such in Yorkshire and Lancashire, and people have encountered difficulties in modernising and expanding them while maintaining the heritage.

The Minister, in common with other hon. Members, may have received an interesting letter from a company called Leigh Spinners, from Leigh in Lancashire, on that subject. That is another area that is worth exploring in Committee.

By and large, we support the widening both of the powers and of the eligibility of recipient bodies, but I want to put on record the fact that there are some serious problems to be addressed. In allowing the private sector access to heritage lottery funding, it is vital that genuine access, rather than token access, be made a priority.

Inevitably, there will also be problems involving clawback, when there is appreciation or development of privately owned sites that have received funding. For instance, it is the public interest that theatres in the west end of London in private hands, which are often fine works by architects such as Masham, should receive grants. I believe that applications are in train to the arts lottery board. It appears that the Bill would allow application on architectural grounds for privately owned theatres to the heritage lottery fund. We support that, but the system of matching funding must be different from and more rigorous than that for applications from publicly-owned theatres.

There is also the problem of how means testing will be done on private houses and theatres, and how development appreciation will be clawed back if capital appreciation results from lottery funding. There are concerns that require clarification. It was not clear from the debate in the other place whether the Government have thought them out.

The Minister gave a rather bland assurance that the Government's position on additionality remained the same. Baroness Trumpington, on Second Reading, stated:

> "The Government have always made it clear that money raised by the lottery for good causes was and is intended to be additional to public expenditure. The Government will not reduce public spending programmes to take account of awards from the lottery. That commitment cannot, however, mean that the Government should set aside the issue of what they can afford to spend on any programme which benefits from lottery funds compared to any other public expenditure programme. The opposite view would be to give an automatic protection to lottery-supported programmes which was not available to others. Such a result would be absurd."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 November 1996; Vol. 575, c. 567.]

There is an internal logic in that, but if one thinks about her view, one sees that it lets the Treasury or the Department of National Heritage make allowances in apportioning grant aid. That opens the door to the end of the additionality principle—a process that is already evident in some grants.

The Minister gave a partial view of the way in which English Heritage has been treated. He mentioned its slight funding increase this year, but, over the past few years, it has fared badly. There is no doubt that the new funds will do work that would otherwise have been done by English Heritage in some respects. In that sense, they are replacing money that should come through grant aid. The Minister slid off that point far too easily, especially in relation to the British museum, which my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow very properly raised.

[Mr. Mark Fisher]

What the Minister said is wrong. If he was seeking to put the blame for the British museum's financial problems on bad management, he would do well to reconsider. People who know and love the British museum will take his criticisms very hard.

Mr. Sproat: I did not make them.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister threw a very partial light on the report and on who is responsible for the situation that faces the trustees of the British museum. I hope that in his reply, he will acknowledge the excellent work of the British museum and its very good trustees. In Dr. Robert Anderson it has one of the best national museum directors. Any other interpretation of the Minister's words would not be appreciated by the museum world, and would be unjust to good people and good work. I hope that he will reconsider what he said, because it is easy to put a malign interpretation on it.

The Minister was disingenuous about additionality in relation to the British museum. He knows perfectly well that national museums, such as the British museum, the Tate gallery, the national gallery and the national portrait gallery, that do not charge for admission, receive a far worse allocation of grant aid from his Department than museums that charge. He was reported in the press as having tacitly acknowledged that he and the Secretary of State took into account the charging policy of museums when apportioning grant aid. He discriminated against those that do not charge.

Mr. Sproat indicated dissent.

Mr. Fisher: He denies it, but the record is that museums that do not charge have been penalised this year. That is an extraordinarily hostile political act, which puts his remarks this evening in a different context.

Mr. Dalyell: I was taken aback when the Minister replied to my question about the British museum. I endorse everything that my hon. Friend has said. We will come back to the matter in Committee. Some marvellous exhibitions have been laid on for the whole of Europe by the British museum, such as the current Chinese exhibition arranged by Carole Michaelson and her colleagues in the oriental department.

Mr. Fisher: I agree with my hon. Friend. In the spirit of Christmas, we should assume that the Minister misspoke, and that he will put the record right when he replies. If he does not, people will be shocked and depressed by an unwarranted attack on a very fine museum and a very fine director.

Additionality is much more complicated than the Minister suggested. He raised the charging policy of museums. It sits strangely with the Bill's avowed interest in increased access that he has been encouraging them to charge by giving favourable funding to those that charge. He has been celebrating those that charge. He well knows that, whenever a museum introduces charges, access to it declines.

Mr. Sproat: Rubbish.

Mr. Fisher: I shall give way to the Minister.

Mr. Sproat: Has the hon. Gentleman not seen the figures for the imperial war museum? Before it introduced charges, it made people go through turnstiles so it knows exactly how many people visited. After it started charging, the number went up. Even with the science museum, where it is claimed that admissions went down, Sir Neil Cossons does not believe that that was the case, because no proper accounting was done before the introduction of charging. The museum's logbooks give ludicrous numbers of visitors for one day; it would have been impossible for it to hold so many people. For the imperial war museum, we have it in arithmetical black and white that there are more visitors; in the case of the science museum, Sir Neil Cossons believes that there are.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister should examine the history of charging museums. He will find that attendance at the national museum of Wales, the natural history museum and others has declined with the introduction of charging. He is right to say that it is difficult to say by precisely how much it has declined, because figures were kept on a fairly random, variable basis. No one disputes that; the Minister should not get so exercised. However, he cannot pray in aid precise figures. He should know that there were particular circumstances about the year after the imperial war museum introduced charges involving certain exhibitions. We are talking about the core collection.

If the Minister knew the history of the imperial war museum, which was very well run by Dr. Alan Borg, he would know that he is not comparing like with like. He is not comparing the figures for core collections; he is talking about specific exhibitions. The important thing about charging does not relate to special exhibitions, for which all museums and galleries sometimes charge, but to access to the core collections. They have been invested in and acquired by the public, who are now being denied free and open access to them. No doubt we will return to the issue, but the Minister should look at his statistics a little more carefully.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Is the hon. Gentleman not tending to underestimate the problems faced by the British museum? As I understand it, even if it introduces charging on the basis of the recommendations, it would still be faced with a shortage of resources for further development and might have to contemplate redundancies.

Mr. Fisher: The right hon. Gentleman will know that one relevant factor is that, when the British library moves out of the Reading Room, the British museum will lose a substantial amount of income, but the Government have not yet made it clear that they will fully compensate it. [Interruption.] If the Minister wants to intervene to say that the British museum will be fully funded and fully compensated for the loss of that revenue, that would be most welcome. I am happy to give way to him if he wishes to put that on the record, rather than do it from a sedentary position.

Mr. Sproat: I did not expect to have to go through the Red Book—after all, it is not all that long since we had the Budget—but it makes it quite clear that, for years two and three, the British museum will indeed be recompensed for the removal of the British library. That is absolutely black and white.

Mr. Fisher: I hope that that recompense will be full, and that there will be no shortfall. The right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) is quite right to say that there are problems over and above those connected with the loss of the British library, but the British museum is a well-run institution, with a huge international reputation. We should recognise that it is a cultural jewel for the country. We should be proud of it, and fund it accordingly.

Leaving aside those differences, the Opposition support the general thrust of the Bill, which fits in well with some of the good recommendations of "Treasures in Trust". One problem with that report, however, is the slight hostility towards local authorities. The Bill encourages greater educational work in a sector that has suffered from Government policy.

Schools museum services around the country, and the number of school visits to museums, have declined because of the Government's hostility towards local education authorities. I welcome the fact that the Bill will fund educational projects, but new initiatives in such projects will be funded in the context of a general decline in support for the schools museum services, which are the bedrock infrastructure of heritage education in our schools. I hope that the Minister will understand that, and work more closely with the Department for Education and Employment.

We believe that the Bill represents a move in the right direction. The emphasis that it places on the natural environment and access, and its wider definition of eligibility, are in line with the Opposition's policies. It admirably prepares the way for a Labour Government, who will have a far more positive attitude towards our heritage and cultural life. For that reason, we commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): It is an immense pleasure to contribute to the debate on a Bill that I greatly welcome, because, for the past five years, other hon. Members and I have called for it.

We debate the Bill against the background of the extraordinary success of the national lottery. The difference that lottery funding is making to the arts, heritage and sport is quite extraordinary and, dare I say it, beyond the dreams of avarice. In the past few months, however, it has become clear to the Government that one sector of our national heritage is missing out. I welcome the Government's commitment to put that right.

In debates on the lottery and tourism in 1994 and 1995, I asked for such a Bill to be introduced. On 24 June 1994, I said in the House:

"The lottery can significantly enhance our ability to restore and preserve the built heritage of Britain, as well as its museums and galleries.

But what about those parts of the heritage that are still in private hands and are so excellently represented by the Historic Houses Association? Is the Minister willing to see funds made available to the owners of the great houses, castles and palaces of Britain on appropriate terms? If not, we may find ourselves contributing to a form of creeping nationalisation, which would be wrong."—[Official Report, 24 June 1994; Vol. 245, c. 464.]

On 30 March 1995, I said in the House:

"Private sector heritage sites and historic houses will face a problem as a result of the regulation that provides that the lottery's proceeds can go only to public or charitable bodies. Privately owned historic houses will have to achieve charitable status to benefit, which will create considerable problems for many of their owners. The tax regime burdens the owners of historic houses and, as a result, dilapidation is continuing and the heritage is suffering. I hope that my right hon. Friend will not lose sight of that problem and will continue to look at ways in which help can be given to preserve our national built heritage that is in private hands."—[Official Report, 30 March 1995; Vol. 257, c. 1256.]

The cavalry has arrived today.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): It is Christmas.

Mr. Coombs: Yes, the Bill will bring the cheer of Christmas to many owners of historic houses, which, until now, have been threatened with dilapidation or closure.

I want to contribute to the debate because of the importance of our heritage to tourism. Last year, 23.7 million foreign visitors came to Britain, no doubt for a variety of reasons, but their desire to see our heritage must have been one of the strongest. Some argue that the Government do not give enough money to the arts, our heritage and tourism, but the lottery, which is enabling us to enhance our tourist attractions, will lead to a growth in the number of visitors. One could think of many examples of such attractions, but I shall limit myself to one. The new Tate gallery of modern art at the Bankside power station site, not far from the House, will undoubtedly attract to London many more visitors who love modern art.

The opportunities to entice more visitors to Britain will more than offset any reduction that the Government may seek to make in the money that they give to the British Tourist Authority or the English tourist board because of difficult financial times. We have created a honeypot, and the bees are coming to it from around the world.

I do not need to labour the importance of our heritage to tourism, because those who are present are well aware of that. Tourism will continue to be a massive generator of jobs, but that must be judged against the background of the degeneration of the infrastructure of so much of our heritage. The work needed to maintain our heritage goes on constantly, and in a sense gets more difficult every year because our heritage ages every year. That decay is all very well when people want to look at ruins. Stonehenge would look pretty odd if we rebuilt it, and I hope that we never do. It would obviously be nonsense to suggest that our prehistoric or Roman heritage should be kept in anything other than its current condition, but what about our heritage from the Jacobean and Tudor eras, which is in private hands and has suffered serious decay over many decades?

British people's interest and that of visitors in our joint heritage is intense and growing. There is no doubt that our generation is far more aware of our past and the importance of our history than any generation that came before it.

I am lucky enough to represent the constituency in which the Royal Commission for Historical Monuments for England has been relocated. I pay tribute to the work of Tom Hassall and his staff. They have created an extraordinarily rich treasure trove, which is now being explored by more and more visitors who come to see our monuments.

There is a growth of interest in this country's industrial heritage, so I welcome the Bill's provision to enable access to our industrial heritage and to promote education so that younger generations will become aware of the United Kingdom's industrial heritage.

[Mr. Coombs]

In that context, I want to refer to another project in my constituency. The Great Western Railway museum in Swindon has occupied an extremely small building for many years, and a project is now before the national heritage memorial fund to convert a much larger building on the old railway works site into a magnificent new railway museum. It is an imaginative scheme, which is supported by the local council, and it could, in time, create a national railway museum of the south, which might complement—but not, I hope, rival—the excellent museum in York.

Interest in railways is intense in Swindon, which has a railway history that is the envy of other towns. That interest is not limited to Swindon and the surrounding area, but is matched by interest throughout the country and around the world. The romance of the Great Western Railway—God's wonderful railway—and of steam brings together people of all ages, each of whom has a small boy or small girl inside who is trying to escape, in remembering the days when they stood on the platform watching the steam engines of the past. I hope that those memories will be found in Swindon's museum of the future.

Mr. Stephen: Does my hon. Friend agree that the importance of a railway museum is that the locomotives should be kept in working order, so that we can see them, hear them and smell them in action and not look at them sitting in a building as a static exhibit?

Mr. Coombs: I welcome that intervention and assure my hon. Friend that there is every intention of providing a linking line from the main Great Western line to the museum, so that railway engines can be moved off the country's main railway network into the museum. It is also intended that a workshop will be created, where people will be able to watch engines being worked on by railway engineers—there are many such engineers living in my constituency who would love to get back to work, albeit in a museum, in order to demonstrate the skills that they mastered in their working lives. In addition, such engines as King George V and Caerphilly Castle will be on display and I look forward to selling my hon. Friend a ticket to the museum when it is built. However, I must stick to my subject and not allow our mutual love of railways—with which I am sure all hon. Members were born—to cause me to stray too far.

We must strike a note of caution. The NHMF and the heritage lottery fund are soon likely to be over-subscribed; despite the success of the lottery, there are more projects awaiting consideration than there are resources to fund them. It is therefore inevitable that some discrimination will be necessary and projects will have to be worth while and well thought out if they are to succeed in obtaining grant funding.

It is not only councils such as my own that are making bids to the HLF; I am glad to say that, rightly, many individuals are seeking to preserve heritage in their area. A quarter of a mile away from the railway museum is a scheme to save the mechanics institution—a building constructed in the 1950s by the Great Western Railway in order to educate its work force and give them an opportunity to understand the cultural advances of the Victorian era. Long before the Education Act 1944 and the Arts Council, an enlightened capitalist company sought to give its employees access to education. The institution was a magnificent building, but it has been closed for many years and has fallen into total disrepair.

As part of the work undertaken a few years ago by candidates of the Common Purpose organisation, a group of people got together to see whether the mechanics institution could be saved from its current state of disrepair. I pay tribute to the efforts of, in the first instance, Colin Grattan and, more recently, Martha Parry and Donald Brunwin, who have tried to put together a project that could be the subject of a bid to the HLF. However, such ad hoc organisations find it extremely difficult to gain access to the professionalism that is necessary to make such projects work and to bring them to a standard that the HLF will accept.

I put it to my hon. Friend the Minister that there is room for help to be given at an early stage, to evaluate schemes while they are still merely a dream or a principle at stake and to determine whether they are worth developing further. Recently, I had the opportunity of discussing that point with the chief executive of the NHMF, Anthea Case, and she assured me that anyone coming to the fund would be given as much help as possible, and I pay tribute to that helpful and understanding attitude among the NHMF's staff. There is a gap, which we could do more to fill by reaching out to people who have dreams and who want to try to help preserve our heritage. I would welcome an opportunity at a later stage to look for ways in which that might be achieved. There are obvious financial implications, but they need not be excessive, and I hope that my hon. Friend will consider the matter.

That brings me to a more general point that should be taken into account when discussing the Bill—matching funds. In a recent debate on tourism, I talked about the problem of matching funds. I draw the House's attention to an example that I cited then: a proposal to give Kennet and Avon Canal Trust £25 million from the HLF. That was welcomed with enormous enthusiasm in Wiltshire and elsewhere along the line of the Kennet and Avon canal, but since the announcement was made, it has become clear that the matching funds needed to enable the scheme to go ahead are considerable—around £7 million has to be found from local sources, and that is not an easy task.

I put it to my hon. Friend that, sooner or later, we shall have to revisit the question of matching funds. If we have decided that a project is sufficiently worth while for us to devote £25 million to it, are we really saying that, if it proves impossible to find matching funds, we do not want the scheme to go ahead at all? We are in danger of appearing to say that. I hope that there will be some flexibility in assessing the quality of projects. They should not be assessed in the context of determining whether there is enough local enthusiasm.

There is always tremendous local enthusiasm for such projects, but there is a limit to the sum that we can ask local authorities to provide out of their necessarily limited budget. There is a limit to how much we can ask the private sector to contribute at local level. All hon. Members know of the constant pressure on the larger employing companies in any area to provide funding for charitable and voluntary organisations. There is a limit to what local fund raisers can raise. A canal stretching 100-odd miles from Bristol to London is not a local project and will not be easily funded locally to the tune of about £7 million. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will have some thoughts on that subject, if not this afternoon, some time during the Bill's passage through the House.

The hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) mentioned access. Of course we would agree that when we give money to, for example, historic houses, it is right to insist on public access—that lottery money cannot be used to prop up a house for its own sake.

We need to be sensitive. Some projects that are proposed as a result of the Bill's passage will involve very small houses that are still family homes. The idea that the general public should have an absolute, unfettered right to tramp through various rooms in those smaller houses lacks sensitivity. The principle of public access is right and obviously we must ensure that we do not go to the other extreme of handing over funds without public access, but I hope that sensitivity will be shown in deciding appropriate access.

Let us suppose that a house is a jewel set in a landscape and is threatened with dilapidation to the point of being unsafe and needing to be pulled down. Are we saying that, in those circumstances, the heritage is not worth saving as a jewel in the landscape, even if the public will have access only to the parkland? Are we insisting that every room or a selection of rooms should be available? I seek from my hon. Friend the Minister a clue as to his thinking on that matter because, in my view, if we create too rigid a principle, we are in danger of ruling out our ability to help smaller houses, which are part of our heritage.

I very much welcome the Bill. It will create difficulties in terms of achieving a balance between the resources available to English Heritage and the national heritage memorial fund, but I am certain that that balance can be achieved and that, overall, the Bill's effect is benign. I welcome the fact that, after two years, the Government have concluded that ownership should not be an issue, and I very much hope that the Bill has a speedy passage.

7.2 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The general welcome that the Bill has evoked reflects the widespread hope that many projects that have not been eligible for national heritage memorial fund help will, as a result of the enlargement of the scope of the funds and of those to whom moneys may be paid, bring about the restoration of heritage, and in some cases the creation of new facilities.

The Bill, although short, is important. It should be made plain that the Bill will not increase the money that the fund disperses. The cake is the same size, although the plates on which the slices are to be distributed will be substantially increased.

Most of the important points about the Bill have been made. I had supposed that it would be largely uncontroversial. It may have been slightly provocative to focus so much attention on the Bill's purpose—to increase access to heritage—at a time when access appears to be threatened by other policies of the Government.

The issue that has sparked a small explosion on both sides of the House—the funding of the British museum—is important. I venture with caution to step into that ring. When the Minister intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent Central (Mr. Fisher) to say that he sought neither to encourage nor to discourage museums regarding a charging policy, he inadvertently adopted an inappropriate attitude for a Minister of the Crown and protector of the public interest.

Many of the great national collections have been accumulated on the assumption that they would remain free and open to access by all citizens, and a large proportion of the donations were explicitly made on that assumption. It is the duty of Ministers of the Crown, in their attitude to charging, to reflect that consideration. Neutrality about whether the British museum charges is not an appropriate posture. Neutrality about whether the national gallery receives, or must rule itself out from receiving, the benefits of Sir Denis Mahon's bounty is not a matter on which a Minister responsible for heritage should be neutral.

Although the task of taking decisions on such questions lies with the trustees, Ministers of the Crown cannot be mute on those issues and should make it plain that, as a matter of public policy, it is desirable that the great national collections remain free and open to access. Those collections should not be saved up for the rare special visit to London. They should be regarded as an archive for reference purposes, to be visited frequently, to be dropped in upon on occasion, when the spirit so moves a visitor, perhaps only to look at a single item, to compare it, reflect on it and be moved and inspired by it. It should not be necessary to purchase that access. Those who have charged for such access, in places such as the Victoria and Albert museum, have diminished our heritage by introducing that charging principle.

The question whether charging diminishes attendance at museums was not conclusively answered by the Minister's intervention about the imperial war museum, based on a relatively short period. There is a pretty strong a priori case against charging, as many people on limited incomes immediately exclude non-necessary expenditure from their spending. Although there have been vast numbers of visitors to the British museum from other countries—notably the United States—who regard much of what is there as world heritage, want to see it when they visit and are well able to afford to pay, there are ways of inducing such visitors to contribute to the costs other than compulsory charging, which adversely affects the least well-off members of our community.

I did not intend to comment on that matter at length. I simply wanted to note the irony that we are considering a Bill designed to increase access against that background. Having noted that, I shall pass on. However, before passing on, I want to ask the Minister whether it is wrong to view the expenditure decisions on museums in the Budget as not revealing Government policy. That double negative may be difficult to follow, but it certainly appeared that museums with a charging policy were favoured by the Budget and those with no such policy, or with a policy of not charging, did not find favour. The British museum, among them, suffered a cut in its grant of £1.3 million. That cannot have been entirely accidental. It was certainly widely believed to be the Government's intention to move in that direction. If the Government want to disavow that intention on the record, they ought to look again at their funding arrangements for the national museums and galleries, whose acquisition fund in particular is under considerable pressure.

[Mr. Robert Maclennan]

The hon. Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) spoke about the mechanics institution, which I had the privilege of seeing on a recent visit to Swindon. I share his enthusiasm for the project and hope that it will be a successful applicant for assistance. I, too, have projects which I cherish and which I hope, as a result of the Bill, will be eligible for assistance.

I was interested to hear what the Minister said about the possibility of townscape heritage being brought within the ambit of the national heritage memorial fund. I have been thinking for some time that the townscape of Wick in Caithness—particularly Pulteneytown, built to a plan by Telford, and one of the first examples of a grid townscape in Scotland—is a site of great historic interest that needs substantial expenditure to restore it to its former glory. The fact that, under the Bill, multiple ownership will not stand in the way of applications for assistance should help projects such as the one at Wick to put together suitable applications for assistance.

On the limited question of access, I question whether the words in the Bill about imposing a duty on trustees to go far enough. That seems to be a subjective test, which is scarcely adequate to reflect the view of hon. Members on both sides of the House that public access is a proper consideration when determining whether money should be paid out.

"bear in mind the desirability of public access"

There are obviously some objects that it would not be possible to keep on permanent display to the public; they may be very fragile, for instance. That sort of consideration should mean that it is not an absolute duty to offer public access in all circumstances. Quite apart from the difficulty of demonstrating whether the trustees have discharged their duty in this respect, the phrase does not go far enough. I therefore commend to the Government a phrase that could be subjected to a more objective test, such as: "The trustees shall give due weight to the significance of public access." I acknowledge that that is a Committee point, but, as I may not have the opportunity to serve on the Committee, I want to make it now.

I noted what the Minister said about the Government's intention to alter the provisions on the remuneration of trustees. I welcome the arguments behind that proposal. On the other hand, I notice that the same clause makes the somewhat surprising proposal that the trustees

"may appoint such officers and servants as they think fit, on such terms . . . as they think fit".

That seems rather sweeping, although it may be standard practice with public bodies. Perhaps the Government will consider introducing guidance; the absolute discretion proposed in the Bill may not be right for a public body of this kind.

In general, I welcome the Bill and its widening of the eligibility criteria. I welcome the new emphasis on access and education, on information technology and on species conservation. I believe that it will enable the fund to do many of the things that it has wanted to do but has hitherto been prevented from doing. I hope that the legislation can be speedily enacted.

7.15 pm

Mr. Peter Brooke (City of London and Westminster, South): I welcome the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan)—in Milton's line, he and I were

"nursed upon the self-same hill".

I recall his attitude to the original National Lottery etc. Bill. I do not allude to it in any spirit of unkindness on this occasion, but I am delighted to note that, despite his opposition to the legislation, he has retained his interest in the subjects that we are discussing tonight.

I apologise to the House for my brief absence at the start of the debate during the Minister's speech. The coincidence of Christmas and the arrival of the recess has meant that one's time is not entirely one's own. I therefore apologise if anything that I say is expressed in ignorance of anything that the Minister may have said when opening the debate.

I welcome the Bill, not least as it gives us the opportunity to praise the national heritage memorial fund and its trustees for their admirable conduct, performance, services and achievements over the past sixteen and a half years. I appreciate the antecedents of the Bill and the need to give greater freedom and flexibility to the trustees to perform—not least through the heritage lottery fund—tasks which everyone believes desirable. That has clearly been the consensus this evening.

I also recognise that the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 is not without its occasional critics. I was not the architect of the Act—we could start a decent-sized architectural practice with those who claim to have been its architect—but I had a subordinate job in the master mason's department. I hope that, over the next sixteen and a half years, it will come to be seen as having been a leather, not an iron, harness, which has enabled sensible and even regular changes to be made to the working of the national lottery, without the need to return to primary legislation.

I have not followed the debate in the other place, so I do not know whether the issue of English Heritage working abroad came up there. Some years ago, the National Heritage Select Committee said that it would be desirable if English Heritage were released to work abroad. I had hoped that this occasion might be taken to give legislative cover to that idea. My hon. Friend may tell me that no such cover is necessary; I hope that he will not tell me that such freedom is not desirable. Although English Heritage's headquarters is in my constituency, I stress that it has given me no briefing on this subject, and that I am not speaking on its behalf.

Matching funds are an important subject; I dare say they will be returned to in Standing Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) mentioned the Kennet and Avon canal. I declare an interest as a patron of the partnership project and the appeal application. I thought that he was perhaps a little unfair to everybody concerned when he alluded to the £25 million for a project that everybody believes should happen but did not mention the immense amount of work that the local community had already done. That was a vivid demonstration of how desirable it was that the project should be carried through.

Mr. Simon Coombs: I did not wish to suggest in what I said earlier that I had anything other than the greatest admiration for the work that had already been done.

I merely wished to point out how much more difficult it would be to find further funding, as opposed to the fund-raising that had been done. A huge extra burden will fall on the people in the localities along the length of the canal and it will be difficult for them to match the £25 million, as I am sure my right hon. Friend agrees.

Mr. Brooke: I take that point totally, and matching funding is a subject to which we should return.

I make the briefest possible reference to the Victoria County History, which has already been mentioned in the debate. Three Government Departments—the then Department for Education, the Department of National Heritage and the Department of the Environment—all sought to avoid taking responsibility for the Victoria County History. The Commission in Brussels believed that the British have a better co-ordinated civil service than any other country in the Union, but that problem was not a classic example of it working well. Co-operation between the three Departments might have solved the problem, but I am delighted that rescue has arrived through the amendment to the Bill in the Lords.

I am also delighted that the amendment was initiated by my noble Friend Lord Beloff. Parenthetically, he was a senior member of the library committee of the Oxford union when I was an officer of the union. I am delighted to enrol under his flag in this cause. Both of us were enrolled under the banner of the senior librarian of the union—I shall be brief in this diversion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I hope that you will not pull me up—Canon Claude Jenkins, who was a remarkable figure and had been the librarian of Lambeth palace. He was not a man of the tidiest disposition, and his fellow canons in Christ Church felt that his garden should be tidied up. They decided to pay for a gardener, but they received a note in Canon Jenkins' enchanting and spidery hand saying, "By order of Canon Jenkins, his garden has this day been consecrated as a bird sanctuary." I bring him into the debate because his garden would clearly have been one of the beneficiaries under the Bill.

I also wish to pay tribute to C. R. Elrington, the former editor of the Victoria County History, who has undertaken an enormous sponsored journey up and down the length of this land in the past year to raise money for the history. I believe that he raised £27,000. One of his stopping places was a couple of miles from where I was staying in August this year. His journey was worthy of Defoe or Lady Celia Fiennes and, given that his itinerary was so detailed that it included exactly when he would be having breakfast, I was tempted, in the spirit of those earlier travellers, to go and observe both the breakfast and his departure, to cheer and huzza. The journey was enormously to his credit, but I am pleased that the Bill will mean that such enormous travels will not be so necessary in the future.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend may be interested to know that there is a connection between C. R. Elrington, Canon Jenkin's and myself. C. R. Elrington and I both listened to Canon Jenkins's lectures on the Theodosian code.

Mr. Brooke: A debate of this sort is improved and enhanced by intelligence such as I have just received from my right hon. Friend, especially given the subject that we are discussing.

The last time that I offered my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench my participation in the Committee stage of a Bill, I am sorry to say that it was refused. I am therefore a little diffident about making the offer again, but the Bill is sufficiently important to me that I am happy to swallow my pride and do so. However, I should not sail under false colours, and I shall close with a brief word about museum charges, because they have been mentioned in the debate already.

I have no inherent objection to the principle of museum charges per se, but a distinction should conceivably be made between museums about whether charges are desirable. I am delighted that huge numbers of people visit our museums in London. We are periodically told by journalists how much better the French order such matters with the Louvre, but it is significant that far more people visit museums in London than visit museums in Paris.

My anxiety is that some potential visitors need to approach museums cautiously and try them out, not because of the public face of the museum but because they are unfamiliar with, or frightened by, the contents of the museum. People need to test the water and find out whether they like what is inside museums. I have an uneasy feeling that charging for entry to somewhere such as the British museum might cause some people never to go inside, when both my hon. Friend the Minister and I would wish them to become addicts of that culture. Charging might hinder that. I shall not labour the point: I merely wish to enter it as part of the spirit of the debate. In total, I support the Bill warmly, and I have greatly enjoyed taking part in the debate.

Mr. Sproat: I wish to respond briefly to some of the points made in this interesting, if short, debate. In particular, I wish to thank all those right hon. and hon. Members, starting with the hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), who gave a strong, warm, general welcome to the Bill. I will return in a moment to the charging issue, which was the one area of mildly abrasive acrimony within our gentle debate—I am sure that we shall also return to it in Committee—but first I wish to thank the hon. Gentleman for his warm support for the Bill. He continued the tradition started in the other place, where the Bill was first debated.

The hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, Central also raised an interesting point about nature conservation. The national heritage memorial fund is keen to support a wider range of nature conservation projects and the Bill will enable it to do so. Funding will be available, for example, for projects involving conservation of rare species, flora and fauna, and so on. He chose a good example of the widening of the activities of the national heritage memorial fund which it was not able to undertake under the rather restrictive definitions of the National Heritage Act 1980.

My hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Sir D. Thompson) raised the question of war memorials, which the hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, Central also mentioned. It would be possible to help war memorials under the present dispensation, but it may be that the widening of the Bill and the psychological increase in the feeling that more causes can be supported will enable war memorials to receive the care and attention that my hon. Friend mentioned that they need. I hope that we shall return to that important example in greater detail in Committee.

[Mr. Sproat]

The hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, Central mentioned the case of privately owned cinemas and industrial premises, and asked whether they would be covered in the Bill. The answer is a firm yes. He also mentioned the case of Leigh mills, and I agree with him. I have been to Leigh mills, although it was some time ago and I cannot remember the exact details. I believe that the building in its present form was built in about 1921 or 1922. I remember that the upper windows are of the architecture of that time. If a building is listed, the owner has to keep it up, which subtracts money from his business and employment. Listing is a difficult area, and Leigh mills is a good example of the problems that arise. It is the sort of case that we should examine in Committee.

The hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, Central talked about the clawback. It is not a hypothetical issue. As I said in my opening speech, English Heritage already provides grants to private owners, and there has been a clawback on several occasions. I have looked through the list and, from memory, the biggest clawback in the past few years was £5,500. Sometimes it was £276 or £330. It was nearly always for the sale of a property, although in one case it was for the sale of land. The point is that it has been done, it could be done again and it should be done with rigour. If it is done, that is how it will occur. I give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks in that area.

I turn now to the British museum and to the points raised by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central and subsequently by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central spoke about the excellence of the British museum. No one doubts the excellence of its scholarship—particularly that of Dr. Anderson, who is of world calibre. However, the mildly disagreeable comments that I made were not my views but those of the Edwards report. The Government did not ask the British museum to conduct an inquiry: the British museum trustees commissioned Mr. Edwards to do it. He found that there were deep and long-standing flaws in the museum's financial and general management, in its organisation and in its general efficiency.

I did not know that the matter would be raised tonight, so I have not refreshed my memory regarding the figures. However, I recall that there has been a 76 per cent. increase in the number of curatorial staff since 1972. That is just one example of the trustees not exercising the kind of control that they might have wished over an expanding staff. My right hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Sir Wyn Roberts) pointed out that, even if charges were introduced, redundancies might still be necessary. That is the view of the Edwards report, not of the Government. It would be extremely sad, but there is a direct correlation between the lax grip on management in the 1970s and the state of the museum today. I am informed that the figure was not 76 per cent. but 70 per cent.—so my memory is not too bad.

The point is that the British museum trustees must decide whether to charge for admission. I know that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland does not agree with that, but the Government believe that such decisions must be left to the trustees. I have a scrap of paper which sets out the details that I gave off the top of my head. As I was out by a few percentage points, perhaps I should refer to it. Of the 10 museums—the British museum, the imperial war museum, the national gallery, the national maritime museum, the national museums and galleries on Merseyside, the national portrait gallery, the natural history museum, the science museum, the Tate gallery and the Victoria and Albert museum—only four received an increase in cash grants between 1992-93 and 1996-97. However, all four charged throughout that entire period, with the exception of the V and A, which began imposing charges in October this year when Dr. Alan Borg—who had seen how well charges worked at the Imperial War museum—was instrumental in introducing them.

There is no question of the Government favouring those museums which charge. It is fair to make that assertion, but it is equally fair for me to refute it utterly. Museums received grant increases this year on the basis of how well they were run—it had absolutely nothing to do with whether or not they charged. I put it to the House and to any fair-minded person that I could not go to Sir Neil Cossens—who has run a very tight ship at the Science museum in the past few years—and say, "Although you have done wonderfully well for your museum, and the British museum is in such a state that it has set up its own inquiry to investigate what has gone wrong, we will not reward you for doing well: we will take money from you and give it to someone who has not done his duty".

That would be deeply unfair.

Some museums received increased grants—the imperial war museum, the maritime museum and others. The hon. Gentleman should be able to remind me of them as he has been going on about it for long enough. The four museums that received increased grants this year did charge for admission, but they were not awarded the grants on that basis. The figures prove that under this Government the museums which do not charge have received more funding. Funding is not based on whether or not museums charge. The facts are irrefutable.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I apologise to my hon. Friend and to the House for coming late to the debate. I went to considerable trouble to be here for seven o'clock, because I was told that it would begin then. The issue must be the survival of the British museum, which is a very special place. Whoever is to blame for what has gone wrong—my hon. Friend has understandably worked himself into a lather about it—the fact is that it is not the scholars or the public, who visit the museum in great numbers. It is crucial that the British museum should remain the flagship of our museums. We must not put the trustees into a straitjacket, restrict the scholarship and make it difficult for people, young and old, to visit the museum.

Mr. Sproat: That is a very important point, but it is not the only one. If museums care well for the artefacts in their charge—as the science museum and the natural history museum have done—it would be unfair to take money away from them to pay for those who have not performed their function. It is the parable of the virgins or the talents—[Interruption.] I was groping for the biblical quotation about the wise and the unwise virgins, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Of course, we shall do everything we can to help the British museum, but its trustees must decide whether to charge. We shall be very happy to provide advice or to meet the trustees to discuss the matter. I noticed that the Opposition spokesman did not tell us whether Labour would reinstate compulsory charging in those museums that have removed it already. I see Opposition Front Benchers nodding, so that is another pledge.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East): I was agreeing that my hon. Friend had not told the House.

Mr. Sproat: Perhaps he will tell us now. Labour should tell us whether it intends to reinstate charging. Charging currently brings in £15 million; if the British museum were to put aside the charging option, it would have to find that sum from Government funds. It is yet another example of the Labour party not telling us what it would do in government. I do not care what a Labour Government would do, but Opposition Members should have the courage of their convictions and tell the House whether they would forbid the museums to charge. If they would, they must confirm whether they would compensate the museums.

Mr. Fisher: I am happy that the Minister has given way on an issue that is hardly central to the Bill. We are getting distracted, but the Minister provokes me somewhat.

I shall make our position clear. My right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) has said on numerous occasions that the Labour party wishes to see access to all the core collections of our great national museums returned to the state of being free by the end of the century. To achieve that, we shall work with those museums. It is a matter not of compulsion, but of coherent partnership policies. Having discussed this matter with many of the museums, we believe that we can achieve that by the end of the century.

What a good way to celebrate the millennium—all our great national museums, such as the British museum and the Victoria and Albert, should be free and open to access. If the Minister is serious about the Bill and about our heritage, he should support that principle and work constructively with us when we are in government to ensure that it happens.

Mr. Sproat: That was an absolutely classic Labour weaselly pledge. Labour would like to see that happen by the end of the decade, but the hon. Gentleman did not and dare not say what Labour will do, because the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) will not allow him to do so. All that the right hon. Gentleman allows Labour Members to do is to speak out of one side of their mouths, give a nudge here and a hint there. They say in private that of course they will do that, but when challenged at the Dispatch Box to say whether they will give another £15 million or £25 million to museums, they will not say.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister has such a crude and unimaginative understanding of these matters. As he said, it is not within the power of Government either to compel or to prevent charges. We believe that it is wrong, and we will work with those galleries and museums to ensure that charging ends. We will not compel them, and we will certainly not fully fund them. The museums that do not charge have had roughly the same budget treatment, but they have deployed their resources differently to ensure that they do not have to charge. They have not received more favourable treatment than those museums that have chosen to charge. We believe that the museums that have charged could have organised their affairs in such a way that, like the Tate or the British museum, they did not need to charge.

We hope that, in the next three years, we can work with the museums, using lottery money and their grant in aid, but we will not give them favourable treatment, and we will certainly not compensate them for giving up charges. We believe that they can reorganise their budgets by the end of the century, and we will work with them to that end. We will not compel them to do so. As the Minister said, it is a matter for the trustees. We believe that most trustees want access to their core collections to be free. They will be working over the next three years with a Government who are positive on that point.

Mr. Sproat: That was another fudge. We still do not know whether Labour will give the museums £15 million. The hon. Gentleman is wrong: the museums that have not charged have received more in the past five years. That is not because they do not charge; it is just a matter of fact. I have given the figures.

As ever, my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) made a much more sensible speech. He talked about the lottery's great success, and was extremely modest about the fact that he was one of the first to say that private owners needed more help. Two thirds of listed houses are in private ownership. It was ludicrous that those private owners could not be helped, but now they will be.

My hon. Friend is an expert on tourism. Last year, 24 million tourists—a record number—visited this country. One of the main reasons why they come here is our heritage. The Bill will greatly help the tourist industry. The problem of matching funds is serious, and I look forward to returning to that issue in Committee.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland gave a general warm welcome to the Bill. He made some interesting points that we shall return to in Committee. I also look forward to discussing his major disagreement with me about charging for admission to museums.

My right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) said that English Heritage should be able to work abroad. He is right. It was partly with that ambition in mind that, earlier this year, English Heritage established its former direct labour force as an independent company, which is now able to use its considerable skills on projects beyond these shores. It is not the Bill that will allow that: it was English Heritage's wise and prescient move in setting itself up as an independent force.

With those few and gentle words, I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation,

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

CONTRACTING OUT

That the draft Local Authorities (Contracting Out of Allocation of Housing and Homelessness Functions) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 28th November, be approved.

That the draft Town and Country Planning (Fees for Applications and Deemed Applications) (Amendment) Regulations 1997, which were laid before this House on 2nd December, be approved.

TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING (SCOTLAND)

That the draft Town and Country Planning (Fees for Applications and Deemed Applications) (Scotland) Regulations 1997, which were laid before this House on 2nd December, be approved.

SOCIAL SECURITY

That the draft Social Security (Incapacity for Work and Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1996, which were laid before this House on 2nd December, be approved.

RATING AND VALUATION

That the draft Non-Domestic Rating (Chargeable Amounts for Small Hereditaments) Regulations 1996, which were laid before this House on 9th December, be approved.—[Mr. Coe.]

Question agreed to.

STANDARDS AND PRIVILEGES

Ordered,

That Sir David Mitchell be discharged from the Committee on Standards and Privileges and Mr. John MacGregor be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Coe.]

Standard Spending Assessment (Hounslow)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coe.]

7.45 pm

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): I am most grateful to have this Adjournment debate, which I presume will be the last debate in 1996. It is wholly apposite that the last debate of the year should be on behalf of my constituents in Brentford, Isleworth, Hounslow and Chiswick, especially the most vulnerable and dependent who are looking to the House for help.

I am particularly grateful for the opportunity to bring to the House's attention the position on the Government's standard spending assessment for the London borough of Hounslow and the way in which the Labour-controlled council in Hounslow is wilfully ignoring the interests of its residents.

I am sorry that neither the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), whose party controls Hounslow council, nor the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who is the Labour party spokesman on local government, is present to participate in the debate. I am extremely sorry that no one from the Labour party is present to listen to a debate on matters relating to the borough of Hounslow and the concerns of the people who live there. I shall take note that no one from the Labour party has bothered to be present, and I shall make it known to all my constituents that Labour Members do not care.

I wrote to the Leader of the Opposition on 6 December about his party's proposals in Hounslow. All I have received 12 days later is a brief acknowledgement that my letter has been passed to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. My constituents will be interested to know that neither of them is here to defend their party's position. Perhaps they are too ashamed, or simply do not care any more about the old, the infirm, the battered or the dispossessed.

In my letter to the right hon. Member for Sedgefield, I addressed him as "Dear Tony"—it is nice to talk about "Dear Tony" letters. I wrote:

"I am writing with some indignation and outrage that your Labour Council in Hounslow is riding roughshod over the views of local people, including two of your own Labour Councillors, Cllr Vanessa Smith and Cllr Pat Nicholas, to penalise some of the most vulnerable members of my constituency.

I refer to the proposed closure by Hounslow Council of the Isleworth Day Care Centre, which enables hundreds of elderly and vulnerable people to receive care and support; and the proposed closure of the Chiswick Family Centre which helps disadvantaged children and their families.

Last year, Hounslow Council had a budget of £196 million. The Government's recent SSA announcement has enabled the Council to raise its total spending by another £3,790,000. The cost of keeping the Isleworth Day Care Centre open is £235,000 and that of the Chiswick Family Centre £30,000. This represents just 0.133 per cent. of the Council's total budget and more important less than 7 per cent. of the increase in SSA that has been granted to the Council"

by the Government

"for next year.

"It is outrageous that the Council should attempt to make cheap political points by attacking the most vulnerable, especially after receiving this additional assistance from the Government.

It is simply mind-boggling that two of your own Councillors, who want the centres kept OPEN have been suspended from the Labour Party for their efforts. Is this what 'New' Labour stands for?"

I am glad to see that a member of the Labour party has arrived to listen to what I have to say.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): I was just passing through.

Mr. Deva: I note that the hon. Gentleman has now "passed through".

The letter continues:

"Your Labour Council should get its priorities right and keep the Isleworth Day Care Centre and the Chiswick Families Centre OPEN. The two Labour Councillors should be re-instated and the closure plans cancelled forthwith."

That was nearly two weeks ago, but, as I said, I have received no reply, which speaks volumes in itself.

Last year, the Government gave Hounslow £98.9 million in revenue support grant; next year, that will be increased to £102.7 million—a rise of £3.8 million. Each year, the Government gives every local authority a standard spending assessment, or SSA, which constitutes their assessment of how much it should cost a local authority to provide a standard level of service. That governs the distribution of revenue support grant to each council. In addition to the revenue support grant, local authorities receive money from the Government through business rates, and they also raise funds through the council tax.

SSAs are built up from various separate elements for various services—education, social services, police, fire, highway maintenance and other services. The different geographical and social characteristics of each area are taken into account, such as the number of children, the number of elderly people and the number who need care. SSAs are a means of calculating Government grant distribution to different local authorities. They constitute neither a limit nor a target for local authorities' actual expenditure, but, all being equal, a higher SSA leads to a higher level of grant from the Government.

It is interesting to note what the Government have been giving Hounslow council. For the past few years, the council has regularly received increases in its SSA. In 1990, the SSA was £124 million; by 1993, it was £165.6 million. That rose to £170.4 million in 1994, £178.7 million in 1995 and £185.6 million last year; and the figure will be a massive £188.9 million in 1997. Next year—after we have allowed for the increase in Government grant and the fact that the council will, as ever, increase its council tax—Hounslow will, for the first time in its history, have a budget of more than £200 million.

I thank the Government for their fair treatment of Hounslow in allocating resources. I think it worth placing on record additional sums given through the single regeneration grant: a further £13 million has been provided for the regeneration of Brentford, which is now well under way, and a grant of another £7.3 million has been announced just this week by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment for the regeneration of Isleworth, in particular its Ivybridge estate. Both those sums are in addition to the normal annual grant from the Government. How ironic it is that, in a week when the Government announce a grant of over £7 million for Isleworth, we must have this debate.

It is worth noting that Hounslow has done better than most local authorities in recent years. Its SSA has increased by 39.6 per cent. since 1991, in comparison with average increases of 36.3 per cent. for outer-London boroughs, and 33.6 per cent. for local government as a whole. The Government have been extremely generous to Hounslow, giving us about 6 per cent. more than they have given other local authorities.

How appalling it is that, in the midst of that extra funding, Hounslow's Labour council proposes to close the Isleworth day care centre and the Chiswick families centre, both of which are much-used and much-needed local facilities. They provide invaluable support for vulnerable elderly people in Isleworth, and for families in Chiswick.

The campaign to keep both centres open has been led by, among others, Mrs. Josephine Langton, a Conservative councillor in Chiswick. However, they face total closure for the sake of a mere £235,000 a year in the case of the Isleworth day care centre, and just £35,000 a year in the case of the Chiswick families centre. Given that Hounslow will have a budget of over £200 million next year, it is utterly callous of its Labour council to attack—inhumanely, cold-bloodedly and ruthlessly—the most vulnerable of my constituents.

That is why I wanted to initiate this debate, and why I wrote to the leader of the Labour party last week asking him to exert pressure on his councillors in Hounslow. I drew attention to the SSA settlement and the huge funds available to the council, and I now wait to discover how the Labour leader will respond to my letter—a letter that asked him to intervene to protect the elderly and vulnerable in my patch.

I place on record my admiration for two Labour councillors, Vanessa Smith and Pat Nicholas, who represent Isleworth's south ward. They want to keep the centres open—as I do—but what has been the reward for their efforts? Suspension from the Labour party.

Suspension from the Labour party for protecting the elderly, the infirm and the vulnerable? Punishment for caring? What sort of Labour party is this? What kind of uncaring monsters appear to be running the Labour party in Hounslow? Despite the SSA settlement, the revenue support grant and the additional Government funds for social services—£190,000 more was provided this year than last year—they are not listening. They are going to shut down those two centres.

More than 80 per cent. of my surgery cases now constitute complaints about the way in which Hounslow council spends its money: about how it cares not for its tenants, cares not for the quality of its housing stock and cares not for the homeless, given that 400 council homes are still unoccupied. We all know that the SSA is divided into a number of components. Within Hounslow's total SSA, the SSA for social services has been increased, as I have said. It is more than enough to keep those two centres open, but only if—it is a big if—Hounslow council decides that it wants to.

That is the nub of the problem. Despite massive public pressure locally, and although some 2,500 people have signed petitions in support of keeping the centres open—despite the extra funding announced by the Government, and despite pressure from their own councillors—those who run Hounslow council still say that they must close the centres. The problem is that Hounslow's Labour council is wasting money hand over fist and is refusing to make sensible savings. Every pound that is saved on administration could be diverted to front-line services.

In calculating the SSA, I am sure that the Minister has taken into account the protection of my most vulnerable constituents. I shall give two examples of how Hounslow council could have saved if it had wanted, these two centres within the SSA. First, the council accepted an in-house bid from its direct labour force for the removal of waste from the borough. That is an essential service, but, by refusing to accept the lowest bid and accepting instead the more expensive in-house higher bid, the council turned down savings of about £400,000 a year—more than enough to divert to the social services budget to keep the centres open. The council chose not to do that.

Even now, the council could take a simple action to keep the centres open. Councillor Paul Lynch, the excellent Conservative leader on Hounslow council, and Councillor Barbara Reed, the Conservative social services spokesman on the council, proposed at a council meeting that the authority's budget be altered to keep the two centres open. They were voted down by a huge Labour majority.

At the request of UNISON, the borough's trade union, Councillor Lynch also asked at the last council meeting for the council to institute a purchasing policy to effect savings. The council totally ignored that suggestion and swept it under the carpet. What a strange turn of events—a Conservative council group leader and a Conservative Member of this House supporting the trades unions and Labour councillors in seeking to maintain essential services for the most vulnerable people in my constituency.

At present, each council department orders its own stationery, office furniture, computers, photocopiers and even paper clips. I have asked how much the council spends on paper clips but no one knows. What a shambles! If the council instituted an overall purchasing policy it is estimated that an annual saving of £35,000 could be made on stationery alone.

That would be enough to keep the Chiswick families centre open, and if the same policy was followed for the council's office furniture, computers and photocopiers, it would be possible to generate savings of £235,000 a year, which would be enough to keep the Isleworth day care centre open. What is more important: office desks and chairs in the civic centre and super-duper photocopiers, or helping frail, infirm elderly people in Isleworth and young children at risk and their families in Chiswick?

Hounslow Labour council has discretion: there is huge leeway. Local councillors could have chosen to exercise that discretion, but they have not done so. If that is so-called new Labour, give us old Labour. Better still, we should let the people know that Hounslow's Labour council is closing two valuable local centres without just reason, to try to make a political point against the Government. It will not wash.

Just one tenth of 1 per cent. of the council's total budget would keep the centres open, and they are provided for within the SSA. They may not be important to the Labour party, but the services they provide are vital to my constituents, as the Government have demonstrated by their generosity in the SSA settlement.

If the council has an ounce of humanity, even at this late hour it will re-examine its priorities, amend its budget proposals, and acknowledge that it can keep the Isleworth and Chiswick centres open. I urge the council to do that, and I urge the Government to make it clear that, if those centres close, it will be due to the callous intransigence of Hounslow's Labour administration. It runs counter to the generous SSA settlement, and is against all common sense and humanity.

8.3 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): My hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) has raised some important issues relating to the way in which the standard spending assessment applies to the London borough of Hounslow.

I am sure that my hon. Friend's constituents, and especially the elderly, the vulnerable and the infirm who depend on the Isleworth day care centre and the Chiswick families centre will take a great interest in what he has said. It is clear from what my hon. Friend said that those centres provide a valuable service to the community, and I am sure that those who benefit from them will have taken a special interest in his speech and in his clear plea on their behalf to Hounslow borough council.

My hon. Friend spoke about SSAs, and I should like to show how the Hounslow SSA fits into the overall system. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment outlined in a statement on 27 November our proposals for local government finance for the coming financial year. Local government accounts for about a quarter of general Government expenditure. It would be absurd to imagine that, within this large total, there is no room for greater efficiency. Therefore, I make no apology for the fact that we have pursued such efficiencies vigorously, but I can also assure the House that we have approached our assessment of what is needed to maintain key services with equal vigour.

We have provided for an increase in total standard spending of 2.5 per cent. on a like-for-like basis. In allocating this total between services, we have given priority to education, social services, the police, and the fire service. We have proposed capping arrangements which ensure that virtually all authorities can spend the whole of any increase in SSA on those services. These proposals represent a sound balance between the need to sustain local government services, the scope for increased efficiency, and the scale of public expenditure which the country can afford.

The mechanism by which the public expenditure proposals are translated into figures for individual authorities is the SSA. Standard spending assessments form the basis for the distribution of the revenue support grant. Standard spending assessments are the Government's assessment of the appropriate amount of revenue expenditure which would allow any authority to provide a standard level of service, consistent with our view of the appropriate amount of revenue expenditure for all authorities.

The calculation of an authority's SSA follows general principles applied equally to all authorities, taking account of each authority's demographic, geographic and social characteristics. Differences in SSAs between authorities with the same service responsibilities are thus due to differences in their underlying characteristics.

My hon. Friend and the residents of Hounslow will be interested to know where Hounslow stands within this system, which is designed to bring about overall fairness in the distribution of revenue support. My hon. Friend gave an interesting account of how Hounslow has fared in recent years. Standard spending assessments were introduced in 1990-91, since when Hounslow's SSA has gone up by 51 per cent. The SSAs for outer-London boroughs have gone up by 42 per cent. on average over the same period. For local authorities overall, SSAs are up by 39 per cent. I know that my hon. Friend will find that of great interest.

For 1997-98, Hounslow borough's provisional SSA has been increased at about the average rate for outer-London boroughs—a 2 per cent. increase compared with 1.9 per cent. for outer london as a whole. In terms of total SSA per head, Hounslow ranked fifth out of the 20 outer-London boroughs. This increase in SSA is more than reflected in the provisional cap limit for the borough, which has risen by 2.1 per cent. Budgets can rise by £3.95 million if the authority feels that that is necessary.

I hope that shows that increasing needs in Hounslow have been recognised by the Government and reflected in the SSA over several years and again for next year's local government finance settlement. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his wise words, which were founded upon his analysis of how Hounslow has fared and his judgment that it has been treated fairly with SSAs.

We have ensured that, among other things, by developing indicators to track spending needs. For instance, Hounslow has a relatively large ethnic minority population—extra costs arising from that are reflected in the measure of additional educational needs. As a London borough, Hounslow faces high employment costs—allowance is made in the area cost adjustment from which the borough benefits.

I drew attention to the priority that the Government were placing on education for next year. My hon. Friend will wish to underline to his authority the fact that Hounslow's education SSA has increased by 4.1 per cent., placing it sixth out of the 20 outer London boroughs on a per pupil basis.

Some concerns have been expressed about funding for personal social services. The year 1997-98 will be tight for social services funding. The average outer London borough faces an SSA reduction of 0.4 per cent. However, even in a difficult year, Hounslow's social services SSA has risen by 0.5 per cent., or £190,000. Hounslow also receives an extra £1.46 million for 1997-98 from the special transitional grant for community care. Such funding is appropriate in the light of my hon. Friend's comments about people with particular needs.

On asylum seekers, on 26 November, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced that local authorities will be reimbursed the reasonable costs that they incur in supporting adult asylum seekers. The exact details of the funding have yet to be finalised, but I assure my hon. Friend that other local services should not suffer. Separate funding arrangements have been made for children seeking asylum.

In the light of the important conclusions that my hon. Friend has drawn, I hope that that factual account of Hounslow's SSA, how it has risen and been dealt with this year, and how it compares with those of other authorities in this and other years, is of interest to him. I agree with him that the settlement for Hounslow is fair. The authority still has considerable discretion within a budget of more than £190 million to allocate resources on what it considers to be its priorities. If Hounslow uses its resources well and pursues efficiencies vigorously, there is no reason why it should not provide good-quality local services without excessive increases in local taxes.

Returning to my hon. Friend's main point about how Hounslow chooses to spend its funds, I believe that its decisions are matters for Hounslow borough council, but I am sure that it and my hon. Friend's constituents and Hounslow residents will have listened with great interest to his powerful plea.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes past Eight o'clock.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Offences (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been arrested since 9 February, and are awaiting trial in Great Britain for offences which can be regarded as related to the situation in Northern Ireland. [6746]

Mr. Howard: Fourteen.

Security Service

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the arrangements for co-ordinating the activities of the Security Service with those of police forces and other law enforcement agencies under section 1(2) of the Security Service Act 1989. [7171]

Mr. Howard: The arrangements, which were agreed between the Director General of the Security Service and the Director General of the National Criminal Intelligence Service, who was designated for this purpose, are set out in the annex to Home Office circular 46/1996 addressed to chief officers of police and others about the Security Service Act 1996. A copy of the circular is being placed in the Library.

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what promotional and public information campaigns his Department is (a) currently running and (b) planning to run during the next six months; and for each campaign (i) how much it will cost, (1) in total and (2) to his Department, (ii) what agencies or bodies are undertaking the work and (iii) what is its planned duration. [7416]

Mr. Howard: My Department is currently running a campaign about the illegal carrying and use of knives. An information pack containing posters and background material has been sent to all schools and further education colleges in England and Wales, police crime prevention officers—CPOs—and local newspapers. A pre-recorded radio interview was sent to 110 local radio stations. Head teachers and college principals have been invited to display the posters and to consider using the support material in student project work. CPOs will invite local retailers and others to display the posters, and will work with local media to stimulate further cover.

It is not possible to state an exact duration for the campaign because it does not use booked advertising space. Free site posters are displayed for varying lengths of time, but my Department's experience is that this can in some cases extend to several months. The total cost of the campaign is £24,265. My Department funded the £20,289 production costs and the Department for Education and Employment and the Welsh Office spent between them £3,976 on distribution. Euro RSCG WNEK Gosper carried out studio work for the poster and the Central Office of Information produced and distributed the radio tape.

My Department plans to run two campaigns between January and February next year. These are:

Fire Safety

A television commercial to encourage the installation and maintenance of domestic smoke detectors: from 1 to 14 January. The total cost is £420,000, all to my Department. The advertising agency is Euro RSCG WNEK Gosper and media buying is undertaken by the Central Office of Information.

Special Constabulary Recruitment

Television and local press and radio advertising to encourage volunteers: from 13 January to 8 February 1997. Total projected cost is £855,000, subject to variance of about £20,000, depending on the number of respondents requesting further information. The advertising agency is Leagas Shafron Davis and media buying is carried out by the Central Office of Information.

A third campaign will run from approximately 24 to 72 hours after the announcement of the date of the next general election, depending on the period of notice given. It is designed to advise the public of absent voters' rights. The budget will depend on media mix and costs of media space at the time, but is forecast to be in the range of £457,000 to £687,000. All costs will fall to the Home Office. Duration is also dependent on the media mix, but will be no longer than three days. Electoral registration officers will carry out supporting activity to inform voters of their rights. The advertising agency is Euro RSCG WNEK Gosper, with media buying handled by the Central Office of Information.

None of the three campaigns uses promotions.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much he estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7545]

Mr. Howard: My Department's spending on public information campaigns in each of the past five years and planned expenditure for the current year is set out in the table.

Plans for publicity expenditure for 1997–98 have not yet been finalised and it is therefore not possible to provide estimates.

Year	Advertising (£)	Other information material and services
1991–92 Total	7,275,940	3,600,288
1992–93 Total	7,344,635	5,638,982
1993–94 Total	9,090,222	5,062,327

Year	Advertising (£)	Other information material and services
1994–95 Total	10,912,000	3,190,358
1995–96 Total	7,609,227	3,179,882
1996–97 forecast total	5,537,000	3,317,000

Prisons

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chief executive of the Prison Service to discuss availability of prison places; and if he will make a statement. [7905]

Mr. Howard: I have regular meetings with the Director General of the Prison Service covering a wide range of issues. The availability of prison places is one of those issues.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of (a) 10-year-olds, (b) 11-year-olds, (c) 12-year-olds, (d) 13-year-olds, (e) 14-year-olds, (f) 15-year-olds and (g) 16-year-olds who were found guilty of offences (i) in each of the last 12 months and (ii) in total which would have made them eligible for electronic tagging under the new proposals; and if he will make a statement. [7503]

Mr. Sackville: Information on 10 to 16-year-olds found guilty of all offences in 1995 is given in the table. Information for 1996 will be available in the autumn of 1997.

It is proposed that a curfew order, with electronic monitoring, will be available to the courts for use with juvenile offenders under the age of 16 convicted of any offence subject to the restrictions set out in section 6 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. It will be for courts to decide whether to apply such an order in any particular case. It will be available initially on a pilot basis.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the results of pilot schemes on the electronic tagging of adults; and if he will include a statistical breakdown of the results. [7504]

Mr. Sackville: The report of the Home Office's evaluation of the first year of trials of electronic monitoring is due to be published later this month. It will include the relevant statistics.

Chahal Case

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if compensation is to be paid to those released from prison arising form the Chahal case. [8120]

Mr. Howard: No.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Chahal [8121]

Mr. Howard: I have reviewed the cases affected by the judgment. I am considering what changes we might make to our appeals system to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights.

Caddy Inquiry

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the names of the 14 cases, representatives of which have received notification that they are being reviewed as part of Professor Caddy's inquiry; and in which cases Mr. Ian Feraday was a Crown witness. [7229]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 4 December 1996]: The representatives of the following individuals were advised that their cases would be examined by Professor Caddy as part of his inquiry.

James Canning
Derek Donerty
Robert Fryers
Patrick Hayes
Hugh Jack
Denis Kinsella

John Kinsella

Ethel Lamb (deceased)

Pairic MacFhloinn

Sean McNulty

Gerard Mackin

Nicholas Mullen

Jan Taylor

Vincent Wood.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will write to the hon. Member in relation to those cases in which Mr. Alan Feraday was a Crown witness.

Judicial Reviews

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many, and in respect of which judicial review application, his Department has been deemed to have acted illegally since May 1993. [7313]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 4 December 1996]: Since May 1993, the Home Office has been involved in several thousand judicial review applications. It has been successful in over 90 per cent. of them. The detailed information requested is not readily available.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she will publish a Government position paper on higher level vocational qualifications; and if she will make a statement. [8633]

Mr. Paice: A document which sets out the Government's current position on this matter is being published today. Copies are being placed in the Library. The document "Higher Level Vocational Qualifications—A Government Position Paper" invites those who have an interest in higher level vocational qualifications, in particular professional bodies and higher education institutions, to engage with the Department for Education and Employment, the National Council for Vocational Qualifications (NCVQ) and the Scottish Vocational Education Council (SCOTVEC) to bring all vocational qualifications into the national qualifications framework.

Education and Training (Teenagers)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to improve education and training for 14 to 19-year-olds. [8634]

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have today published a White Paper, "Learning to Compete: education and training for 14–19 year olds" (SO Cm 3486).

"Learning to Compete" builds on the Government's achievements over the past decade in increasing choice, participation and attainment by young people in education and training in England. It sets out the Government's vision for first-class education and training for the next century, based on the entitlement of all young people to learning, on the need for employability, and on the value of effective partnerships at national, regional and local level. It is designed to renew our drive towards the national targets for education and training, helping young people to play their part in a successful society, and Britain to strengthen its international competitiveness.

The White Paper draws on extensive and invaluable consultations over the past year, in particular on the conclusions of Sir Ron Dearing's review of 16 to 19 qualifications. It proposes a wide-ranging programme of action for the Government and their key partners to improve young people's learning further, and to ensure their successful transition to employment and further learning throughout life. In particular, the White Paper:

- introduces from September 1997 a new learning credits entitlement for all young people aged 14 to 21 to career planning and learning opportunities up to level 3. This will improve young people's participation and attainment and encourage them to value their learning more. The Government have also published today a consultation document, "A Passport to Learning", on the detailed implementation of learning credits;
- enhances the breadth and rigour of the qualifications framework at key stage 4 and beyond, in particular by making part 1 GNVQs available from September 1998 to all schools who wish to provide them, strengthening GCE A-levels, GNVQs and NVQs, and promoting key skills throughout education and training;
- acts to make education for 14 to 19-year-olds more relevant to the world of work, by supporting innovative approaches to vocational study by 14 to 16-year-olds, introducing a new national record of achievement and encouraging more effective use of labour market information in making choices at 16;
- introduces a relaunch strategy—a new start for young people—to bring disaffected 14 to 19 year-olds back into learning with partnership projects at local level;
- introduces from September 1997 national traineeships to help 16 to 19-year-olds reach NVQ level 2 and acquire key skills with employers, taking forward the successful approach of modern apprenticeships;
- develops common principles to underpin the effective internal and external quality assurance of all 16 to 19 learning, including the introduction of an external inspection regime for work-based training providers and more consistent measures of performance;
- takes forward the application of common principles to the funding of learning in schools, colleges and work-based training, supporting good recruitment practice and effective teaching and training and rewarding successful achievement, in order to enhance choice, cost-effectiveness and fair competition; and
- introduces new funding arrangements from 1997–88 for training for young people, which are consistent with these principles and designed to reduce bureaucracy for training and enterprise councils and their providers.

This programme of action demonstrates the enhanced capacity of my Department to make coherent policy in this key area. It will be supported by the expenditure plans for my Department set out in the Budget. The Government will work closely with their key partners and with providers to take it forward successfully.

Copies of the White Paper and the learning credits consultation document have been placed in the Library.

GCSE Scores

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each year since 1991, for all English secondary schools, on the same basis as her Department's annual school performance tables, the average GCSE point scores, in five percentile groups ranked by their 15-year-olds achievements. [6406]

Mrs. Gillan [holding answer 28 November 1996]: The following list for 1996 shows the average GCSE point scores, in 5 per centile groups, ranked by their 15-year-old pupils' achievements. The figures are based on the school performance tables published in November and exclude data from the published schools that had fewer than 10 pupils aged 15. The averages quoted are simple averages, based on the sums of the percentages divided by the number of schools involved. Data for earlier years have been provided on a slightly different basis from those given in the reply to the hon. Member's questions of 7 November and 19 December 1995, Official Report, columns 960 and 1034 respectively.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many and what proportion of consultees who responded to the section on extending the freedom of grant-maintained schools in the White Paper, "Self-Government for Schools" were in favour of the proposed extensions. [6925]

Mr. Forth [holding answer 28 November 1996]: We received 637 responses to the White Paper "Self-Government for Schools". More than three quarters were from LEAs and LEA-maintained schools. Less than 2 per cent. were from GM bodies and GM schools. The table gives the information requested.

Proposal	Number of responses commenting on the relevant proposal	Number and percentage in favour
To remove the requirement for GM schools to publish statutory proposals to:
(a) open or close a nursery	176	7 (4)
(b) open or close a sixth form	195	6 (3)
(c) add or remove boarding provision	152	5 (3)
(d) expand their capacity by up to 50 per cent.	188	5 (3)

Education Expenditure

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will publish a breakdown of (a) the £830 million available for education in 1997–98, according to the statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, (b) the £875 million quoted in the departmental press release and (c) the £633 million available for local education authorities, showing how the above figures are intended to be spent. [7470]

Mr. Robin Squire: The £875 million is the increase in provision for schools, colleges and universities between 1996–97, after adjusting for in-year changes, and 1997–98. Of this, £830 million relates to schools. The £633 million is the increase in local authority education standard spending—total education standard spending assessments plus recurrent specific grants to local authorities related to education—as announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment in his statement to the House on the local authority financial settlement on 27 November 1996.

The breakdown of the £875 million increase is shown in the table:

Increase in:	£ million
Education standard spending assessments[1]	591
New money for the nursery voucher scheme	129
Assisted places scheme	22
GEST	22
GM recurrent	15
OFSTED	13
Schools capital[2]	9
Specialist schools[3]	7
Other smaller items[4]	22
Sub total—schools	830
Further and higher education institutions	45
Total	875

[1] After adjustments for changes in function and funding, in particular the national introduction of the nursery voucher scheme
[2] After allowing for contribution to LA challenge
[3] Includes an increase in capital provision of £3 million
[4] Including additional resources for ethnic minorities (section 11 grant), teacher training, changes to key stage 2/3 tests, the music and ballet scheme and literacy and numeracy centres.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when, by what mechanism and to which local authorities the £50 million in capital allowances announced in the Budget statement will be distributed. [7471]

Mrs. Gillan: I expect to make an announcement about the distribution of credit approvals to local education authorities and of grant to governors of voluntary-aided schools for 1997–98, including amounts over and above the previously announced baselines, later this month. A copy of the Department's letter setting out the basis on which these distributions will be made has been placed in the Library. Further support is also available through the specialist schools programme. The distribution of grant to the governors of grant-maintained schools is a matter for the Funding Agency for Schools.

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much her Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much she estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7542]

Mr. Robin Squire: Total spending on advertising and publicity for the Department is as follows in financial years. Before the merger in July 1995, the Department operated separately funded programmes of publicity. This continued until the end of the financial year 1995–96.

Department for Education:

1991–92: £9.0 million
1992–93: £8.0 million
1993–94: £10.1 million
1994–95: £9.4 million
1995–96: £5.4 million.

Department of Employment:

1991–92: £18.3 million
1992–93: £7.2 million
1993–94: £11.1 million
1994–95: £11.1 million
1995–96: £11.0 million.

Current estimated spending for the Department for 1996–97 is £17.3 million. The budget for the next financial year is still under discussion, but is provisionally estimated as some £12.5 million.

Personal Services Industry

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what is her policy in respect of the continuing payment of jobseeker's allowance to people who have refused to take a job in the personal services industry; [7993]

(2) if she will include in the next set of jobseeker's regulations an explicit provision that no jobseeker should have his or her benefit refused or reduced for refusing to take a job in the personal services industry. [7994]

Mr. Forth: I am satisfied that the legislation on refusal of employment already contains adequate safeguards. First a sanction can be imposed only when the opportunity of employment was notified to the jobseeker by a jobcentre adviser. Advisers will not suggest that people should apply for jobs that are obviously inappropriate, and Employment Service guidance is currently being strengthened to ensure that jobseekers are not submitted to undesirable or inappropriate vacancies. Secondly, no sanction is imposed if a jobseeker had good cause for refusing or failing to apply for an opportunity. Adjudication officers should take any relevant matter into account in deciding whether good cause was shown. Where appropriate, this must include the fact that the jobseeker refused the opportunity because of a sincerely held conscientious objection to the work concerned.

Education and Community Values

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what criterion was used by the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority in determining who should receive the questionnaire with the consultation document in the consultation exercise on values in eduction and the community; and if she will make a statement. [8098]

Mrs. Gillan: The School Curriculum and Assessment Authority—SCAA—issued two separate questionnaires: one to a random sample of schools; the other to some 700 national and local organisations on SCAA's general mailing list. The questionnaires were designed simply to distinguish replies from these two samples. An independent research organisation is analysing the results. The consultation document remains available, although the consultation period ended on 29 November. SCAA will take account of all representations and will publish an analysis.

Local Education Authorities

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how much money was raised by local education authorities in each year since

1992 (a) nationally, (b) in the west midlands and (c) in Coventry; and what was the percentage change from the previous year in each case; [7698]

(2) how much local education authorities are required to raise themselves for the years 1996 and 1997 (a) nationally, (b) in the west midlands and (c) in Coventry; and what is the percentage change from the previous year in each case. [7699]

Mr. Robin Squire: Local authorities have discretion in setting council taxes. The revenue income of local education authorities between 1993–94 and 1996–97 has come primarily from the following sources: the authority's entitlements to revenue support grant and other special and specific grants; the authority's share of the amounts distributed from the non-domestic rates pool; council taxes raised by the authority itself, or by the relevant billing authorities in the case of county councils; and any revenue raised from sales, fees and charges, which in turn depend on the range of functions carried out by the authority. The table shows the council taxes calculated by local education authorities to support their revenue expenditure each year from 1993–94.

It is not possible to provide a comparable figure for 1992–93, as arrangements for raising taxes were different under the community charge system. The figures for English local education authorities are not comparable with those for west midlands and Coventry city council because the England figures include shire counties and inner-London boroughs, which are responsible for a different range of services from other education authorities. Figures for 1997–98 will not be available until authorities have set their budgets in 1997.

Council taxes 1993–94 to 1996–97

	1993–94 £ million	1994–95 £ million	Increase on previous year Per cent.	1995–96 £ million	Increase on previous year Per cent.	1996–97 £ million	Increase on previous year Per cent.
England	7,367.0	7,709.0	4.7	7,999.0	n/a	8,630.0	7.9
West midlands	401.0	401.0	0.1	432.0	7.8	471.0	8.9
Coventry	51.1	56.8	11.2	60.1	5.8	61.7	2.6

The figure for English local education authorities for 1995–96 is not comparable with 1994–95 because police services were transferred from shire counties to police authorities on 1 April 1995.

School Funding

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how much money her Department provided for schools in each year since 1992 (a) nationally, (b) in the west midlands and (c) in Coventry; and what was the percentage change from the previous year in each case; [7697]

(2) how much money will be provided to schools for the years 1996 and 1997 (a) nationally, (b) in the west midlands and (c) in Coventry; and what is the percentage change from the previous year in each case; [7700]

Mr. Robin Squire: The great bulk of money is provided by local education authorities. Since central Government support to local authorities is not hypothecated, it is not possible to say how much of this support has been deployed for schools. Central Government plan financial provision for local authorities on the basis of standard spending assessments. The table sets out the education standard spending assessments between 1992–93 and 1997–98, but local education authorities are free to decide how much to spend on schools and other services in allocating their overall budgets. Because of changes in local authority functions, such as the loss of responsibility for most further education in 1993–94, the reform of inter-authority recoupment in 1995–96, and the arrangements for nursery vouchers in 1997–98, the cash figures are not comparable year-by-year. The tables therefore show (a) the unadjusted education SSAs for Coventry, the west midlands and England from 1992–93 to 1997–98 and (b) the underlying percentage changes after local authority changes of function have been taken into account.

Feversham College, Bradford

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she expects to receive an application by Feversham college in Bradford for voluntary aided status; when she refused an earlier application; what were the main grounds for refusal; what contacts there have been since that refusal between her officials, representatives of the college and representatives of Bradford local education authority about the latest application; when she expects to announce a decision on the latest application; and if she will make a statement. [8005]

Mr. Robin Squire: A previous application from the college was rejected last year, but my right hon. Friend indicated that she was ready to consider a fresh application. For the reasons for rejection, I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him of 23 February 1995, Official Report, column 294. I understand that consultation is under way in Bradford on a possible new application from Feversham college for voluntary aided status. The officials met representatives of the promoters and Bradford LEA on 15 May 1996 and have kept closely in touch since then. We have made it clear that we are willing to offer such advice and help as we can. If the promoters decide to publish fresh proposals, these will come to my right hon. Friend for decision and will be considered on their merits.

Museums and Galleries

Sir Patrick Cormack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list those museums and galleries which form part of universities in the United Kingdom and for which they have financial responsibility, direct or indirect, indicating the location, date of foundation, nature of governing body or bodies, name of the director, number of permanent staff, total annual running cost, number of visitor admissions per year, and any admission charge made, at the most recent convenient date. [8078]

Mr. Forth: The Higher Education Funding Council for England—HEFC—provides financial support for 23 museums, galleries and collections at 13 universities. In addition, it provides financial support for earth sciences collections at four of these institutions. The table lists the higher education museums, galleries and collections that receive support.

"The Museums Yearbook", published by the Museums Association gives details of location, date of foundation, nature of governing body, name of director, permanent staff, number of visitor admissions each year and admission charge made for museums and galleries across the UK. It is available in the Library. Details of the annual running costs are held by individual museums and galleries.

Mr. McShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent contacts he has had with representatives of the Greek Cypriot Government in London. [7669]

Mr. Soames: During the course of this year, the Secretary of State for Defence has had discussions in London with President Glavkos Clerides, Foreign Minister Michaelides, and High Commissioner Markides.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what overseas visits he has made in an official capacity since June. [7670]

Mr. Soames: Since 1 June 1996, the Secretary of State for Defence has visited the following countries in his official capacity:

Australia Belgium
Bosnia and Herzegovina
Bulgaria
Croatia
Denmark
France

United Arab Emirates
USA.

RAF Logistics Support Service

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about defence agency status for the Royal Air Force Logistics Support Service. [8296]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The RAF Logistic Support Services will become an agency from 9 December 1996.

The agency will provide a comprehensive logistic service to a range of customers including all three services, the procurement executive and the aerospace industry. This will include policy advice; the introduction to service and in-service support of aircraft and associated equipments; logistics consultancy and information technology services. The agency will employ approximately 1,100 staff, comprising RN and RAF personnel and civil servants.

The first chief executive will be Air Commodore Ian Sloss who will be afforded the powers, responsibility and flexibility to build on the current organisation's expertise and high performance standards. The chief executive will be directly accountable to the Secretary of State for Defence and to Parliament for the conduct and performance of the agency.

The agency has been set the following key targets for the first year of operation:

(1) To produce 95 per cent. of task reports, within aerospace maintenance development and support and information date management, by the target dates agreed with the sponsor and to acceptable quality.

(2) To evaluate 95 per cent. of all tasks within 25 days of receipt of the initial tasking documentation.

(3) The logistics computer centre will process 95 per cent. of all business system changes within the timescale agreed with the originator of the request and to acceptable quality.

(4) To develop a task and resource accounting management system—TRAMS—by 31 March 1997 to measure the delivery of logistics support service in peace and for operations as specified by the customer.

(5) To implement TRAMS across the agency by 31 March 1998.

(6) To establish baseline management metrics by 31 March 1998.

(7) To implement a personnel strategy plan from 31 March 1997 and to achieve accreditation to Investors in People by 31 March 1998.

(8) To meet an efficiency target of 3 per cent. for the financial year 1996/97.

(9) To meet a proposed efficiency target of 3 per cent. for the financial year 1997–98.

(10) To undertake, starting in April 1997, the British Quality Foundations' business excellence model self-assessment and to have a numerical assessment upon which to base future high level benchmarking exercises by November 1997.

(11) To achieve BS EN ISO 9001:1994 certification for all departments outstanding by 31 March 1997; and to maintain BS EN ISO 9001: 1994 certification for those departments already certified for the period 1997–98.

Copies of the agency's framework document and corporate plan will be placed in the Library of the House.

Combined Arms Tactical Trainer

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the Army's requirement for a combined arms tactical trainer. [8449]

Mr. Arbuthnot: A contract has been awarded to Lockheed-Martin Information Systems for two combined arms tactical trainers—CATT—to meet the Army's requirement for a new training simulation system. Lockheed-Martin was selected as the prime contractor following a full evaluation of the procurement options. The company has gained considerable experience of such systems through its development of the US Army's close combat tactical trainer. The contract, supported by a memorandum of understanding between my Department and the US Department of Defence, provides for substantial UK industrial involvement in high-quality work. GEC Marconi has been selected by Lockheed-Martin as its lead United Kingdom partner. It is planned that the British company will take over as prime contractor from 2003. The award of the CATT contract will initially sustain or create about 90 jobs mainly at GEC Marconi at Donnibristle, Fife. Further jobs will be created in the United Kingdom when CATT enters its production phase.

Discharged Personnel (Allergies)

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel have been medically discharged in each of the past 10 years because of allergic reactions. [6630]

Mr. Soames: This answer could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Low Flying

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the United States and Canadian Governments concerning low flying; and if he will make a statement. [7591]

Mr. Soames: My right hon. Friend has not recently discussed military low flying with representatives of the United States and Canadian Governments. My officials, however, have regular discussions with their counterparts from these countries on a wide range of topics including low flying.

Proposed Force Reductions

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the scale of the proposed reduction in the size of (a) the Army, including the Gurkhas but excluding the Royal Irish Regiment, (b) the RAF and (c) the Royal Navy between (i) 1 April 1990 and 1 April 1999 and (ii) 1 April 1992 and 1 April 1999, under the Government's current plans; and if he will make a statement. [7590]

Mr. Soames: The total strength, trained and untrained, of the armed forces, including Gurkhas and other locally employed personnel, on 1 April 1990 and 1 April 1992 was:

	RN	Army	RAF
1990	63,500	161,500	89,700
1992	62,400	154,100	86,000

Under current plans, the total intended strength of the armed forces, inclusive of LEPs, on 1 April 1999 will be:

RN	Army	RAF
44,000	115,000	55,500

Army Strength

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total trained strength of the British Army at (a) 1 April 1990 and (b) 1 April 1992, including the Gurkhas but not including the Royal Irish Regiment. [7589]

Mr. Soames: The trained strength of the British Army including Gurkhas but excluding the Ulster Defence Regiment and locally employed personnel was 144,800 at 1 April 1990 and 140,800 at 1 April 1992.

PRIME MINISTER

IRA

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Prime Minister on what occasions, and through what arrangement he or his office has had communications with the IRA since 1 September 1994. [7199]

The Prime Minister: None.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list by Department each occasion when Her Majesty's Government have entered a scrutiny reserve at Council of Minsters meetings, indicating the matter concerned.[7531]

The Prime Minister: Arrangements exist to prevent items coming forward for decision in the Council of Ministers where a member state's parliamentary scrutiny procedures have yet to be completed. The presidency may, nonetheless, occasionally place an item on a Council agenda for decision which is still subject to parliamentary scrutiny in a member state. Information on the occasions when the United Kingdom has as a consequence maintained a scrutiny reserve at the Council of Ministers is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Correspondence

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Library (a) a copy of the letter recently sent to him by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume); and (b) any documents which accompanied the letter or his reply. [7818]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 6 December 1996]: It is not my practice to reveal correspondence, either letters or accompanying documents, which are sent to me in confidence. As for my reply to the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) on 28 November, Official Report, columns 460–61.

President Mary Robinson

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Prime Minister if the present visit to Great Britain by President Mary Robinson is an official visit. [7817]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 6 December 1996]: No.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iraq

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the oil-for-food deal between Iraq and the United Nations agreed in August to be implemented; and if he will make a statement. [7523]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: UN Security Council resolution 986 (1995) will come into operation when the UN Secretary-General believes that conditions for its effective implementation have been met. We believe that it might be as early as this week.

West Indies Guardship

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made this year to countries in south America and the Caribbean about the anti-drug work of the West Indies guardship, its access to territorial waters and its powers to board vessels registered in these countries; and if he will make a statement. [7950]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We have made no such representations regarding the West Indies guardship—WIGS. I have, however, made representations to the Venezuelan Government, following the refusal by the Venezuelan authorities to grant permission to the Royal Fleet Auxillary Gold Rover, which operates in support of WIGS, for US law enforcement officers embarked on the RFA to board a Venezuelan flagged vessel suspected of drug trafficking. I made clear this Government's view that article 17 of the 1988 UN drugs convention, which the United Kingdom and Venezuela have ratified, provides the legal framework for maritime anti-narcotics co-operation.

French Fishermen (Minquies)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with EU Ministers in respect of rescinding the concessions granted to French fishermen to fish in the Minquies. [7791]

Dr. Liam Fox: None.

Afghanistan (National Museum)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received about the unauthorised sale of items formerly held by the national museum of Afghanistan; and if he will make a statement. [8015]

Dr. Liam Fox: We have received no such representations in recent years about the unauthorised sale of items formerly held by the national museum of Afghanistan. However, we regard the preservation of Afghanistan's cultural heritage as important.

European Union (Government Policy)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to promote Government policy in support of the European Union. [6507]

Mr. David Davis: The Government are tireless in promoting their European policy in the House and in public. Their overall position was set out in a White Paper, "A Partnership of Nations", earlier this year.

Bosnia–Herzegovina

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources have been allocated to clear land mines in Bosnia–Herzegovina. [6526]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The UK has contributed £428,000, including our share of EU assistance, to humanitarian mine clearance work in Bosnia and Herzegovina. We also seconded military personnel to assist in the establishment of the UN mine action centre in Sarajevo.

High Commission Official (Bradford Visit)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by whom a senior official at the British high commission in Islamabad was recently invited to visit Bradford; what was the purpose of the visit; if he will list those with whom the official had meetings; and if he will make a statement. [8004]

Dr. Liam Fox: No official of the British high commission has recently visited Bradford. An official from this Department called on councillors, community centres and the Bradford racial equality council in August as part of his preparation for taking up a post in Islamabad.

Government Communications Headquarters, Cheltenham

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to relocate which operational facilities from GCHQ Cheltenham; and to where. [7756]

Mr. Rifkind: None. However, GCHQ is currently undertaking a study into its requirements for future accommodation and related services. This study includes consideration of whether those requirements can be satisfied through the private finance initiative, and will include investigation of the possibility of collocating all the work currently carried out on the two Cheltenham sites.

EU General Affairs Council

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters were discussed at the European Union General Affairs Council on 25 November; and what decisions were taken. [8188]

Mr. David Davis: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 29 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), Official Report, columns 461–63.

Child Labour

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the report "Helping Business to Help Stop Child Labour", produced by Anti-Slavery International; and what guidelines are provided to British Government employees working in, or visiting, foreign countries, with regard to the employment and treatment of children. [7246]

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

It is Government policy that wherever British missions and British officials overseas employ local staff, it is done in complete accordance with local law.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Mr. George Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list by authority and service area the recorded deficits made by local authority direct labour or services organisations in Scotland that have failed to meet the rate of return requirements operating under the terms of the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980 and the Local Government Act 1988 for the financial year 1994–95 in both cash and constant prices; [7140]

(2) if he will list, by authority and service area, the surplus achieved on trading accounts by local authorities' direct labour or services organisations in Scotland for those services covered under the terms of the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980 and the Local Government Act 1988 for the financial year 1994–95 in both cash and constant prices. [7141]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 2 December 1996]: A detailed list, taken from annual reports submitted by authorities, of the surpluses and deficits achieved by direct labour and direct service organisations of Scottish local authorities in 1994–95 is as follows:

Roads Programme

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of the Budget statement on the projected programme for the construction of the M80 motorway between Stepps and Haggs; and if he will make a statement. [7832]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 6 December 1996]: My right hon. Friend will make a statement on these matters in the near future.

TREASURY

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Bank of England is taking to ensure the millennium compliance of its computer systems and those with which they are connected; what is its budget for this purpose; and if he will make a statement. [6665]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Bank of England has already begun to prepare its own computer systems for the millennium. It is also liaising with APACS—the Association for Payment Clearing Services—which oversees the payments systems, and with commercial banks. No separate budget has been set for this process, which will be accommodated within departmental software development budgets.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of how much it currently costs to answer (a) an oral and (b) a written parliamentary question. [7642]

Mrs. Angela Knight: A total of £249 and £107 respectively, as I stated in my reply to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on 4 December 1996, Official Report, column 656.

Unemployment

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what forecast of those registered as unemployed on the claimant count in 1997–98 underlay his assumptions in respect of resources available for out-of-work benefits and related passported entitlements; and if he will list this forecast for changes in levels of claimant count unemployment in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [7477]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The assumptions for unemployment which underlie the public expenditure plans are given in table 5A.5 of the 1997–98 "Financial Statement and Budget Report."

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department plans to spend on celebrating Christmas and the new year. [7487]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Such costs are included in the Department's running cost expenditure, which is published in the annual report.

National Insurance

Ms Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each source of taxation revenue and for national insurance, (i) the amounts received and what percentage that is of total revenue and (ii) the numbers of people paying in (a) 1980, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) 1995. [3044]

Mr. Jack: Information on the amounts received is in the table. Figures for the numbers of people paying some of these taxes is contained in "Inland Revenue Statistics", a copy of which is in the Library. Information on the numbers of people paying other taxes is not available.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Minimum Wage

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those countries in the European Union where a minimum wage has been imposed following a directive from the European Commission. [7012]

Mr. John M. Taylor: There is no requirement for states in the European Union to introduce minimum wages. Arrangements for determining pay is a matter for individual member states—a fact recognised in the Commission's opinion on an equitable wage.

Nuclear Materials (Accounting and Control)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what review his Department has conducted of its system of accounting and control of nuclear materials at nuclear plants and nuclear fuel cycle facilities. [6992]

Mr. Nelson: All civil nuclear material in the United Kingdom is subject to Euratom safeguards and to the terms of the UK-International Atomic Energy Authority-Euratom safeguards agreement. My Department liaises with the international inspectorates to ensure that these obligations are met. This includes reviews of the systems of nuclear material accounting and control at facilities. The United Kingdom will also continue to offer its full support to the development of a strengthened international safeguards system.

Child Labour

Miss Lestor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of the report, "Helping Business to Help Stop Child Labour", produced by Anti-Slavery International; what action he is taking to encourage British businesses abroad to adopt fair employment practices; and if he will make a statement. [7245]

Mr. Nelson: It is for British businesses to ensure that they are complying fully with their legal obligations and ethical standards. The Government encourage British businesses operating overseas to respect the OECD guidelines for multinational enterprises, which cover employment practices, among other things.

Miss Lestor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to encourage British companies overseas to act as model employers by taking action to avoid exploitative practices, particularly involving children. [7247]

Mr. Nelson: It is the responsibility of individual companies to satisfy themselves that they are complying with local law and acting in accordance with ethical standards. The Government encourage British businesses operating overseas to respect the OECD guidelines for multinational enterprises, which cover employment practices, among other things.

EU Common External Tariff Level

Mr. Shore: To ask the Secretary of the Board of Trade what is the 1996 average level of the common external tariff of the European Union; what was the average level in (a) 1966, (b) 1976 and (c) 1986; and what the common tariff level is planned to be when the Uruguay round is finally implemented. [7461]

Mr. Nelson: In 1966, 1976 and 1986, the average levels of the common external tariff of the European Union in the industrial sector were in the order of 12 per cent.,
9.5 per cent. and 6.5 per cent. respectively. Precise figures are not available. Moreover, there are no equivalent figures for the agricultural sector in those years because chapters 1 to 24 of the common external tariff then contained many specific rates, for example by weight or by volume. The Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations was the first such round in which the ad valorem equivalents of specific rates were calculated, thus enabling inclusion of agricultural products in the average tariff level. The average level of the overall common external tariff in 1996 is 4 per cent. When the Uruguay round is fully implemented it will be 3.2 per cent.

Small Businesses

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, column 498, on small business statistics, if he will name the two independent sources. [8028]

Mr. Page: The information requested is in my answer of 2 December 1996, Official Report, column 498.

Armoured Vehicles (Indonesia)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about exports of armoured vehicles to Indonesia. [8636]

Mr. Lang: I have authorised the issue of licences to Alvis for the export of a further 50 armoured vehicles, and their associated equipment, to Indonesia. The decision has been made following consultation with the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, in the light of the established and internationally agreed criteria for military exports.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the export of armoured vehicles to the Indonesian police force. [8635]

Mr. Lang: I have authorised the issue of an export licence to Procurement Services International Ltd. for a variety of police vehicles. The licence includes seven Tactica water cannon and associated equipment. This decision has been made following consultation with the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in the light of the established and internationally agreed criteria for military exports.

Energy Council

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the outcome of the Energy Council meeting on 3 December. [8632]

Mr. Page: The Council considered several issues and received reports from the Commission on matters of interest. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Energy represented the United Kingdom.

A policy debate was held to discuss the way forward on a proposal to liberalise the gas market. The Council recognised the presidency's compromise proposals as an important step in the right direction and as a good basis for progress in further discussions. There was considerable convergence of views on the four key issues of public service obligations, unbundling and transparency of accounts, access to the system and take or pay contracts. The Council agreed that further work was required in order to ensure a rigid conclusion of this proposal under the Dutch presidency, due to end in June 1997.

The Council discussed a proposal for a Council regulation establishing a multi-annual programme to promote international co-operation in the energy field—SYNERGY—and asked for work on this dossier to continue.

A debate was also held on renewables following a Commission presentation on an EU strategy. Lord Fraser stressed that renewable forms of energy had to be both economically attractive and environmentally acceptable if they were successfully to penetrate the market.

Council conclusions were agreed on a Committee report on oil supply, refining and markets in the Community. The conclusions welcomed the report and asked the Commission to undertake studies and continue to monitor and analyse the situation in close co-operation with member states.

Conclusions were also agreed on the energy dimension of climate change. They recognised the contribution of energy policy to the climate change debate and asked for reports to be made on progress in this area including on the negotiations on a protocol in the framework of the UN convention on climate change.

On deregulation, the Council endorsed a report from the Commission on the review of Community energy legislation which will enable several legislative acts to be repealed.

The Council reached a common position on a proposal for a Council and European Parliament decision amending the guidelines on trans-European energy networks, updating the list of projects of common interest.

The Council agreed the decision on the conclusion of the energy charter treaty.

The Commission gave a presentation on a proposal for a council decision on the organisation of co-operation around agreed Community energy objectives. The Commission also gave progress reports on the energy dimension of the Euro-Mediterranean partnership, the proposed electricity liberalisation directive, the proposed decision on a multi-annual programme for the promotion of energy efficiency in the Community—SAVE II—and the proposed directive on rational planning techniques in the electricity and gas sectors, and gave information on the auto-oil programme.

Private Utilities (Directors)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with the directors of the private utilities regarding their pay and conditions. [6500]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The remuneration of directors at the privatised utilities is a matter for the companies and their shareholders.

Electro-magnetic Compatibility Directive

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress he has made in securing modifications to the European Union's electro-magnetic compatibility directive to minimise the cost of compliance for British small businesses. [6510]

Mr. Ian Taylor: My Department continues to seek support from other member states for modifications to the directive, and we have requested the European Commission to review the directive in 1997 as part of the simpler legislation for the internal market—SLIM. The Government have also commissioned a consultant to study compliance problems concentrating on the problems faced by small and medium enterprises. Meanwhile, the Department supplies guidance to business on how to minimise compliance costs.

Competition Policy

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on progress towards implementing the Government's manifesto commitments in respect of competition policy. [6511]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government are committed to the reform of competition law. In March of this year, my Department published a consultation document on the approach to reform, and in August we published a draft Competition Bill. We intend to introduce the Bill when parliamentary time allows.

TRANSPORT

M1

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is the capacity of the M1 between each junction from junction 1 to Luton, assuming typical flow composition, traffic speeds and weather; and what the current flows are for the hours of (a) 7 am to 10 am and (b) 4 pm to 7 pm as a percentage of that capacity between each junction; [6802]

(2) what have been the accident rates in each of the past five years per mile of motorway (a) on the M1 between junction 1 and Luton and (b) on the motorway network as a whole. [6801]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. James Pawsey, dated 9 December 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent questions about traffic flows and accident rates on the M1 between Junction 1 and Luton (Junction 10).

There is no precise measure of road capacity which can be universally applied, even for motorways. The spacing of junctions and the volumes of traffic leaving and joining can have a significant impact on capacity for a typical motorway. The capacities used in calculating the percentages in the table below have assumed a maximum flow per lane per hour of 2,000 vehicles. At this level, the average speed will be significantly lower than the National speed limit. This is also the point at which stop/start conditions may be expected arising from traffic joining and leaving the motorway, incidents, poor driver behaviour or adverse weather conditions.

Junction	Vehicles southbound 7am –10am	Vehicles northbound 7am –10am	Vehicles southbound 4pm–7pm	Vehicles northbound 4pm –7pm
1–2 (3 lanes dual)	10,000 (56 per cent.)	4,500 (25 per cent.)	5,100 (28 per cent.)	9,100 (50 per cent.)

4–5 (3 lanes dual)	13,700 (76 per cent.)	7,100 (39 per cent.)	7,300 (41 per cent.)	12,800 (71 per cent.)
5–6 (3 lanes dual)	11,000 (61 per cent.)	6,200 (34 per cent.)	7,200 (45 per cent.)	11,200 (62 per cent.)

6a–7 (4 lanes N/B, 3 lanes S/B)	15,00 (83 per cent.)	11,5000 (48 per cent)	12,000 (67 per cent)	15,000 (63 per cent.)
7–8 (4 lanes dual)	17,800 (74 per cent.)	14,100 (59 per cent.)	14, 600 (61 per cent.)	18,100 (75 per cent.)
8–9 (3 lanes dual)	13,000 (72 per cent.)	11,200 (62 per cent.)	12,200 (68 per cent.)	15,100 (84 per cent.)
9–10 (4 lanes N/B, 3 lanes S/B)	11,300 (63 per cent.)	11,000 (46 per cent.)	11,500 (64 per cent.)	15,600 (65 per cent.)

n/a = not available.

Figures in percentages are the actual flows as a percentage of the capacity based on 2,000 vehicles per lane per hour.

Details of the accident rates for the main carriageway of the M1 between Junction 1 and Junction 10, together with the national accident rates are set out in the table below. The rates are provided both in terms of the number of accidents per mile, and in terms of the number of accidents per 100 million vehicle miles travelled, the measure normally used when comparing safety records between different sections of road.

Year	National rate (accidents/mile)	M1(J1–J10) rate (accidents/mile)	National rate (accidents/100 million vehicle miles)	M1(J1–J10) rate (accidents/100 million vehicle miles)
1991	3.42	7.48	16.5	14.8
1992	3.54	8.21	17.7	16.3
1993	3.76	8.85	17.7	17.6
1994	3.92	7.69	17.7	15.3
1995	3.99	9.57	17.0	19.0

Motorway Cleaning

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) of 18 November, Official Report, column 410, on cleaning motorways, how many people are employed by the Highways Agency to inspect the state of cleanliness of motorways. [7282]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Harry Barnes, dated 9 December 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people are employed by the Highways Agency to inspect the state of cleanliness of motorways.

The Highways Agency does not directly employ any staff to carry out this function. Management of motorway cleaning is delegated to Maintaining Agents, most of whom are local highway authorities. These Maintaining Agents employ sufficient staff to ensure that the Highways Agency's requirements, set out in its Code of Practice for Routine Maintenance, are met.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 27 November, Official Report, column 266, if he will require Eurotunnel to publish the results of evacuation tests in the channel tunnel. [7647]

Mr. Watts: It is for Eurotunnel to decide whether the results of evacuation tests in the channel tunnel are published. My Department has no power to require publication.

Rail Privatisation (Consultants)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many consultants employed by Samuel Montague in relation to rail privatisation were paid over £100 per hour. [7649]

Mr. Watts: The rates of pay of employees of consultants are a matter for their employers.

Rail Service Information

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the provision of information on rail services by Rail Direct; and if he will make a statement. [8019]

Mr. Watts: Since April 1996, my Department has received 14 representations about the provision of information on rail services by Rail Direct and other telephone inquiry bureaux.

Rail Passenger Complaints

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the average cost of dealing with a railway passenger's complaint under the former system in the last year in which it operated; and what procedures are now in place to deal with complaints. [7966]

Mr. Watts: The information requested on the average cost of dealing with railway passenger complaints is not available.

All train operators have in place a complaints handling procedure which has been approved by the Rail Regulator and conforms to the guidelines issued by him. The procedures, among other matters, detail time limits for action so that complaints are kept informed of the progress in dealing with their complaint.

Polystyrene (Fire Risks)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 418, if he will place in the Library copies of the research undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive into the fire and smoke hazards of polystyrene, together with its recommendations. [7775]

Mr. Watts: Copies of the reports "Assessment of fire hazard of materials: Report 1/8/88 to 1/11/88", G. Atkinson, HSE report and "The medium scale fire test facility: final report on commissioning trials", R. K. Wharton, HSE report 1985 have been placed in the Library of the House.

Railway Claims

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to persuade private wagon owners to join the claims, handling and allocation arrangements operated by Railway Claims Ltd. [8084]

Mr. Watts: The Rail Regulator published a consultation document in August 1996, about insurance against third party liability, a copy of which was placed in the Library. He intends to initiate a group to explore the railway claims handling and third party liability issues raised by the operation of private wagons.

Drivers (Eye Tests)

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many police forces in the United Kingdom have instituted on-the-spot eye tests for drivers; and if he will make a statement. [8094]

Mr. Bowis: We have no information on the policies of individual police forces in respect of on-the-spot eye tests. In the event of a road traffic incident, the police make a judgment about whether eyesight may have been a factor, and act accordingly—using the number plate test as a quick check if necessary.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce on-the-spot eye tests for drivers; and if he will make a statement. [8095]

Mr. Bowis: None. Drivers are reminded of the need to assure themselves regularly that they can still meet the requirements of the number plate test and of their statutory obligation, if they cannot do so, to cease driving and notify the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency.

Rail Franchises

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the value of the performance bonds which could be called in by the franchising director in the event of the need to terminate each of the franchises so far awarded. [8079]

Mr. Watts: The information is available in respect of franchises which have commenced operation, and is set out in the table:

Franchise	Performance bond (£ million)
Cardiff Railway Company	0.90
Chiltern Railway Company	2.15
Connex South Central	14.50
Connex South Eastern	19.50
Gatwick Express	2.50
Great North Eastern Railway	17.75
Great Western Trains	16.50
Island Lines	0.15
LTS Rail	4.00
Midland Main Line	6.50
South Wales and West	5.00
South West Trains	21.00
Thames Trains	4.25

Fatal Accidents

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fatal accidents there were per 1,000 miles of travel on British (a) railways, (b) motorways and (c) non-motorway roads in the last year for which figures are available. [7498]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available in the form requested.

French Lorry Drivers' Strike

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what progress has been made in securing compensation from the French authorities for British lorry drivers who were stranded during the French lorry driver dispute; [8114]

(2) how many compensation claims made by British lorry drivers who were stranded during the French lorry driver dispute have been met (a) in part and (b) in full by the French authorities to date; [8115]

(3) what has been the average values of compensation paid to British lorry drivers by the French authorities in relation to claims resulting from the French lorry driver dispute; [8116]

(4) how much has been paid in compensation by the French authorities to British lorry drivers stranded during the French lorry driver dispute; [8117]

(5) what action he has taken to ensure British lorry drivers' compensation claims resulting from the French lorry driver dispute are met in full by the French authorities. [8118]

Mr. Watts: My right hon. Friend obtained firm assurances from the French Transport Minister that claims for damage to vehicles or loads and for loss of earnings will be considered, and as quickly as possible. We are seeking to clarify this week with the French authorities the procedures and administrative arrangements for submitting claims. Thereafter, we shall press the French for swift settlement.

Shipping

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on Government plans to promote the environmental advantages of shipping as a means of transporting freight. [7839]

Mr. Bowis: It must be for industry to determine whether water can provide both a practical means to its transport needs and make good commercial sense.

We encourage industry to consider the benefits of using shipping as an alternative to road transport where this is feasible.

Freight facilities grants are available for inland waterway capital developments that can demonstrate environmental benefits through saving lorry miles.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his Department's plans to support the British-registered merchant navy. [7840]

Mr. Bowis: We recognise that shipping makes an important contribution to our nation's well-being. We have put in place a range of targeted measures, including simplified procedures, liberalised officer nationality requirements, substantial and effective financial assistance to seafarer training and tax incentives to replace aging tonnage.

We have also taken tough action against sub-standard shipping and continue to urge other countries to exercise discipline in the use of market-distorting state aids.

These measures are making a positive contribution to the industry's competitive position in increasingly competitive international markets, the attractiveness of the red ensign and career opportunities for British seafarers.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the perceived political loyalty of magistrates in each area of Wales, appointed in each of the past seven years. [7499]

Mr. Streeter: The stated political affiliation of magistrates in each preserved county in Wales appointed in each of the past seven years, is as follows:

Reconciliation Services

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what sums will be allocated for reconciliation services as a result of the Family Law Act 1996; and if such funds will be used solely for reconciling the couple to remaining married. [8186]

Mr. Streeter: The Lord Chancellor announced on 6 November that he was inviting tenders for a programme of pilot projects in order to identify types of service with particular potential for reducing the incidence of marriage breakdown and its consequent cost. Tenders have been invited from marriage support organisations. All valid bids will be evaluated on merit after 17 January 1997. Funding under the programme will be available for a range of marriage support services, including marriage preparation. The sums allocated will depend on the number of bids received which meet the pilot programme objectives.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Emergency Relief

25. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the consequences of the Chancellor's Budget statement for his Department's expenditure in respect of emergency relief. [6523]

Dr. Liam Fox: The Chancellor's statement will have no direct or indirect effect on the capacity of the ODA to continue to provide overseas emergency relief.

Rwanda

27. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current level of aid to Rwanda. [6525]

Dr. Liam Fox: Since April 1994, the United Kingdom has committed over £137 million bilaterally and in support of European Union actions to help meet emergency and rehabilitation needs in Rwanda and those of Rwandan refugees.

Lome Convention

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with other EU countries regarding the future of the Lomé convention. [6524]

Dr. Liam Fox: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development has discussed this topic in several recent meetings with her counterparts from other EU member states. Most recently, the topic was raised at the EU Development Council on 22 November, where Ministers had the opportunity for an initial exchange of views on the issue.

Belarus

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what current financial assistance is being committed for the assistance of the economy in the Republic of Belarus; and if he will make a statement. [6527]

Dr. Liam Fox: The Government are not providing financial assistance to Belarus. That country has benefited from a modest level of technical assistance from the know-how fund and from our contributions to the multilateral agencies.

Bilateral Aid

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what expenditure, in 1996 prices, his Department has incurred on consultants, including management consultants, on the bilateral aid programme in 1995–96. [6976]

Dr. Liam Fox: Expenditure on consultants, including management consultants, for 1995–96 was £171,770,000. This sum covers contracts with individuals, charitable agencies, universities and commercial companies.

ENVIRONMENT

Town Centres

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the implications for Government policy on town centres of his Department's decision to contribute towards the research by the Association of Town Centre Management into the feasibility of US-style town and city improvement zones. [7174]

Sir Paul Beresford: This research is exploring the feasibility of a variety of approaches, based on voluntary participation, and is in line with our response to the Environment Committee to work with ATCM and others. I cannot prejudge the outcome of the research.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what external legal advice he has taken in respect of the Audit Commission's use of the powers set out in sections 28 and 29 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982; and if he will make a statement. [7644]

Sir Paul Beresford: It is for the Audit Commission to satisfy itself that it is acting fully within its powers under sections 28 and 29 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money is to be yielded by national domestic rates in 1996–97; what percentage of that amount is allocated to local government and how much of that amount was held back by the Treasury in 1996–97; and what estimate he has made of the figures in each case for 1997–98. [7476]

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) on 27 November, Official Report, column 242–44.

Because of the pooling arrangements, it is not possible to say what percentage of the non-domestic rates yield for any one year is allocated to local government in that year. Under paragraph 8 of schedule 8 to the Local Government Finance Act 1998, the Secretary of State for the Environment is required to distribute to local authorities the total amount which he estimates will be paid into the pool, after adjusting for any deficit or surplus brought forward from the previous year.

By the end of 1996–97, the amount distributed from the pool since 1990–91 to local authorities will total £81.476 billion, while the amounts paid into the pool are estimated to total £80.631 billion over the same period: the deficit on the pool at the end of 1996–97 is, therefore, estimated to be £0.845 billion. Taking account of estimated payments into the pool of £12.873 billion in 1997–98, the amount paid into the pool between 1990–91 and 1997–98 is estimated to total £93.503 billion, and will equal the amount distributed to local authorities over the same period.

Self-employed (Deaths and Injuries)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the rate of (a) death and (b) major injury among the self-employed in each of the last 10 years. [7526]

Sir Paul Beresford: The fatal and major injury incidence rates for self-employed people for all industry, as reported to health and safety enforcing authorities, were as follows:

Year	Fatal rate (per 100,000)	Major injury rate (per 100,000)
1986–87	2.0	26.9
1987–88	3.0	31.0
1988–89	2.7	39.4
1989–90	3.3	41.2
1990–91	2.7	41.2
1991–92	2.1	33.1
1992–93	2.0	35.8
1993–94	1.6	40.6
1994–95	2.5	40.4
1995–96[1]	1.5	35.9

[1] Provisional.

Shellfish

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many and what proportion of England's shellfish waters have been designated as safe under the shellfish waters directive 79/923. [7683]

Mr. Clappison: The shellfish waters directive applies to coastal and brackish waters designated by member states and defines quality objectives to protect the development of shellfish populations from the principal sources of pollution. Seventeen such waters have been designated in England, and the Environment Agency monitoring results for 1995 showed that over 80 per cent. complied with the directive's requirements. None of the failures was considered by the competent authority to have harmful consequences for the development of shellfish colonies.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward proposals to restore for areas of outstanding natural beauty the same primary purpose as that pertaining to national parks. [7758]

Mr. Clappison: We have no plans to do so.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the separation of the common primary purpose previously enjoyed by the national parks and areas of outstanding natural beauty; and if he will make a statement. [7759]

Mr. Clappison: I am not aware of any such representations.

Asbestos

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of the prosecutions brought for breaching asbestos regulations since 1986 resulted in the imposition of a fine; and what was the average value of the fine imposed. [7903]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested is available only for prosecutions brought by the Health and Safety Executive's field operations directorate for breaches of the Asbestos Regulations 1969, the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983, the Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1985, the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987 and the Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1992, from 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1996.

Not all prosecutions brought result in a conviction, and not all convictions result in the imposition of a fine. However, fines were imposed in 354 instances and the average fine imposed was £840.

Nuclear Power Stations (Decommissioning)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of delaying the rate of decommissioning of nuclear power stations. [8047]

Mr. Clappison: Environmental impact assessment—EIA—of the decommissioning of nuclear power stations will be a new requirement, included in the proposed directive to amend EC directive 85/337/EEC—"the EIA directive". The Government are considering how this and other new requirements should be implemented.

Animals (Traditional Habitats)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to reintroduce fish species into habitats from which they have disappeared because of industrial and farming pollution. [7495]

Mr. Clappison: The Environment Agency identifies deficiencies in fish stocks through routine fishery surveys. Where the cause of such deficiencies is water pollution, the agency considers restocking as one of the options for restoring fisheries once the pollution has been remedied. In many cases, fish will recolonise naturally. More generally, the species recovery programme, which contributes to the UK biodiversity action plan, is concerned with the reintroduction of species of flora and fauna to traditional habitats.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to reintroduce mammal species into traditional habitats in which they no longer occur. [7496]

Mr. Clappison: The species recovery programme—SRP—initiated in 1991 is a high priority for countryside agencies and makes an important contribution to the UK biodiversity action plan. The programme seeks to reintroduce species of flora and fauna to traditional habitats in which they no longer occur.

In addition to established SRPs, work is being advanced for the reintroduction of the dormouse, red squirrel and the otter. These measures accord with objectives outlined in the Government-endorsed UK steering group report on biodiversity, which sets out action plans for mammals and includes objectives and targets for the reintroduction of some mammals to areas where they have been lost.

Single Regeneration Budget (Bradford, West)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce his decision on the Bradford, West SRB bid; and if he will make a statement. [8006]

Sir Paul Beresford: Shortly.

Departmental Staff (Education)

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of his staff at G5 and above were educated at (a) independent schools, (b) the university of Oxford or the university of Cambridge and (c) independent schools and the universities of Oxford or Cambridge. [7981]

Sir Paul Beresford: No central record is kept of the status or type of school attended by members of the senior civil service in this Department. Thirty five-of-22 per cent. senior civil service officers attended the university of Oxford and 45—28 per cent.—attended the university of Cambridge. Therefore, 80—50 per cent.—attended the universities of Oxford or Cambridge.

Air Pollution

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in respect of the system of local air pollution control which was established under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. [8338]

Mr. Clappison: The Government have today published a progress report on the implementation of the system of local air pollution control which was established under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

The local air pollution control system specifies processes which are not to be operated without an authorisation from the relevant local authority. One of the main objectives of the system is to reduce industrial emissions and to improve local air quality.

The report show that, since 1991, business has submitted some 15,000 applications for authorisation. Local authorities have decided 92 per cent. of all applications. This is a considerable achievement, given the task which local authorities faced, not least in familiarising themselves with new legislation, procedure and technical information.

The report also highlights the important role local air pollution control will play in the successful development of the new system of local air quality management, which was established under the Environment Act 1995.

Local air pollution control should result in substantial improvements in air quality in locations where industry has been a significant air pollution source, helping us to achieve air quality targets and commitments.

For example, a large number of industrial emitters of volatile organic compounds fall within local air pollution control. The Government's strategy to secure a 30 per cent. reduction in annual volatile organic compound emissions between 1988 and 1999 places considerable reliance on the reductions in emissions of volatile organic compounds which will result from local air pollution control. Present indications are that, by 1999, the reduction may be of the order of 40 per cent., reflecting a significant contribution by local air pollution control.

One reason for the success of local air pollution control has been the adoption of a partnership approach. Central and local government, business and wider interests have been actively involved in the development of both policies and procedures.

While local air pollution control now appears to be firmly established and is operating effectively, the next five years will involve new challenges, including a substantial amount of upgrading of existing processes over the next two years. The report, which we have published today, will help to develop a clear view of the issues which face local air pollution control in the next few years and the priorities which should guide its development.

I have arranged for a copy of the report to be placed in the Library of the House.

British Waterways

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to begin consultations concerning the possibility of British Waterways becoming a statutory consultee within the planning process. [8333]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I have today issued a consultation paper seeking views on a proposal that British Waterways should in future be consulted on planning applications that are likely to affect the canals, river navigation and reservoirs it owns or manages, and the associated canal feeders, watercourses and let-offs. Our concern at present is that British Waterways is not always being made aware of proposals that may affect the stability and integrity of the waterways for which it is responsible, with potential cost implications for all concerned. Copies of the paper have been placed in the House Libraries and distributed to local authorities and other interested organisations. We have asked for responses by 17 January 1997.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provision other than supplementary credit approvals has been made by central Government for local authorities in respect of their responsibilities in relation to contaminated land under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 in each year since 1993; and what provision he expects to be made in this respect for future years. [7920]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Each year, the Government set a level of revenue spending—total standard spending, or TSS—which they consider appropriate for local authorities, in aggregate, to spend. TSS is made up from seven main service blocks. Provision for local authorities' existing expenditure on contaminated land under the statutory nuisance regime in part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 forms part of the other services block, as will revenue spending under the specific contaminated land regime in part IIA of that Act when those provisions are brought into force.

In deciding on the appropriate level of TSS each year, the Government take account of all spending pressures faced by local authorities, as well as the scope for efficiency savings and what the country as a whole can afford. TSS, however, is the Government's assessment of the appropriate level of spending in total. It is not possible to identify how much has been included to meet individual burdens or pressures.

Apart from the contaminated land supplementary credit approval programme, no specific provision is made by central Government for capital expenditure by local authorities in relation to their responsibilities for contaminated land under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Bodies

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many appointments to public bodies have been made on the recommendation of the Irish Government in each of the last 15 months. [6117]

Sir John Wheeler: Appointments are not made on the recommendation of the Irish Government. The Irish Government are entitled to propose candidates for consideration, alongside other candidates, for appointment to public bodies in Northern Ireland. The number of appointments made in each of the last 15 months of candidates proposed by the Irish Government is as follows:

Month	Number of appointments resulting from Irish Government proposals
1995
September	0
October	0
November	0
December	0
1996

[1] Up to 27 November.

Six of the appointments made in 1996 resulted from proposals made in 1995.

Inward Investment

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will (a) list those overseas companies which have chosen to locate or invest in Northern Ireland and (b) estimate the number of jobs created in Northern Ireland through inward investment in each of the last five years. [6371]

Mr. Ancram: A list of overseas companies which have been assisted by the Department of the Economic Development to locate or invest in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years is as follows. The list also includes the names of those overseas owned companies in the retail sector who are known to have announced projects in the period of the question.

Targeting of Social Need Initiative

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what monitoring of deprivation levels in parliamentary constituencies has been undertaken by Government Departments in each year since the introduction of the targeting of social need initiative; and if he will list the results recorded; [6781]

(2) what monitoring of deprivation levels in district council areas has been undertaken by Government Departments in each year since the introduction of the targeting of social need initiative; and if he will list the results recorded. [6785]

Sir John Wheeler: The 1994 Robson indicators—Department of Finance and Personnel, policy planning and research unit, occasional paper No. 28, "Relative Deprivation in Northern Ireland"—are used within Government to inform programmes which target social need and are available for local government districts, but not for parliamentary constituencies. This publication was placed in the House of Commons Library.

The dependence of the Robson measures on data from the decennial census of population precludes their use for routine monitoring of deprivation levels. However, some of the indicators making up the deprivation index are measured routinely. Unemployment levels by local government district area and parliamentary constituency, for example, are published monthly by the Department of Economic Development in its unemployment press notice.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) full-time, (b) part-time, (c) male and (d) female jobs there were in Northern Ireland in October 1979 and in October of every succeeding year until the present time. [6391]

Mr. Ancram [holding answer 2 December 1996]: The information requested is not available. However, data for September of each year are shown in the table:

Spring and Mineral Water

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list (a) the number of contracts between Department of the Environment Services and suppliers of spring or mineral water, (b) the quantities of water involved in the last year for which figures are available and (c) the cost of supplying such water to Department of the Environment offices. [7469]

Mr. Moss: The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland currently has 15 contracts with suppliers for the provision of spring and mineral water to its offices and a number of other premises within the Northern Ireland civil service general office estate. In 1995–96, the last full year for which figures are available, 11,715 litres of water were supplied at a cost to the Department of £5,928.97.

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much he estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7538]

Sir John Wheeler: The following is the information:

1991–92: £182,321

1992–93: £509,013

1993–94: £650,666

1994–95: £1,021,292

1995–96: £1,906,545

1996–97: £140,000 (estimate)

1997–98: £Nil (estimate)

Drug Seizures

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on drug seizures in Northern Ireland in 1996. [7592]

Sir John Wheeler: Up to 30 November 1996, the RUC has seized 70,931 ecstasy tablets, 147 kgs of cannabis resin, 5,871 gms of herbal cannabis, 2,116 LSD tablets, 13 kgs of amphetamines, 237 gms of cocaine, 137.5 gms and 1,175 tablets of opiates, including heroin. During the same period, Customs and Excise has seized 4,295 tablets of ecstasy, 10,044 kgs of cannabis resin, 43 gms of herbal cannabis, 120 gms of cannabis resin—space cake— one cannabis joint, 200 tablets of LSD, three amphetamine wraps, 2 gms of heroin and 3 gms of psilocin—magic mushrooms.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department will spend on Christmas trees and decorations this year; how many Christmas trees will be bought for his Department's headquarters; and what are the type and country of origin of the trees. [7560]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments will spend £860 on 28 Christmas trees and various decorations. The trees will be of north American large pole pines, Norway spruce, noble fir, silver fern and an artificial nordic spruce, originating from Northern Ireland, Scotland and China.

Health and Social Services Information

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list current circulars issued by the Department of Health and Social Services Management Executive to health and social services boards and health and social services trusts; and if he will update them in line with the exercise undertaken by the Department of Health in its local authority social services letter issued in Britain in July. [7744]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 6 December 1996]: A list follows of the circulars issued by the Department of Health and Social Services executive to health and social services boards and health and social services trusts since 1 January 1996. Information about circulars issued prior to this date could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The Department does not currently have a central list of all extant guidance but as part of the development of is communication strategy consideration will be given to this issue.

Social Services (Assessment of Need)

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by board and trade the number of assessments of need for non-residential social services support undertaken by health and social services trusts and health and social services boards in 1994 and 1995 under (i) section 3 of the Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1989, (ii) section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1978, (iii) relevant sections of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972 and (iv) other relevant enactments governing assessment for non-residential social services support. [7750]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Information on assessments is not available in the form requested.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Vicarages and Palaces (Security)

33. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, how much was spent on security of vicarages and bishops' palaces in each of the past three years in real terms; how many buildings were involved in each year; what were the principal measures involved; and if he will make a statement. [6532]

Mr. Alison: The provision of security measures for parsonage houses and suffragan bishops' houses is the responsibility of dioceses, which have done much in recent years to improve matters. The commissioners offer advice and this is currently under review.

The commissioners are responsible for see houses and have put in hand security measures which are appropriate to the individual properties and the personal circumstances of the bishop, his family and staff. Such measures also meet the stringent requirements of the commissioners' insurers. Measures include the installation of integrated fire and intruder alarm systems. Detailed figures are not available, but I can assure my hon. Friend that this important work is properly funded.

Property Holdings

35. Mr. Steen: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby representing the Church Commissioners, what discussions the Church Commissioners have had with the Charity Commission about the reduction in value of the Church Commission's property portfolio, and if he will make a statement. [6534]

Mr. Alison: In the three years to 1995, the commissioners' United Kingdom property portfolio achieved a total return of 17.9 per cent. per annum and they were the best performing fund of all those measured by the Investment Property Databank. In the 10 years to 1995, the return averaged 9.1 per cent which was slightly ahead of that recorded by the WM all-funds index.

The Church Commissioners are not subject to control by the Charity Commission, although meetings are held from time to time on matters of mutual interest.

WALES

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of children educated at (a) primary and (b) secondary schools are in grant-maintained schools. [7237]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: As at January 1996 (a) 0.4 per cent. and (b) 4.9 per cent.

Hospital and Ward Closures

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many hospital and ward closures there have been in (a) Wales and (b) Clwyd between 1979 and 1995. [5557]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The available information is given in the following table:

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what promotional and public information campaigns his Department is (a) currently running and (b) planning to run during the next six months; and for each campaign (i) how much it will cost, (1) in total and (2) to his Department, (ii) what agencies or bodies are undertaking the work and (iii) what is its planned duration. [7410]

Mr. Hague: My Department is currently running the following promotional and public information campaigns, which include advertising:

	Total cost to my Department £	Agencies	Duration
Nursery Education Voucher Scheme[1]	80,000	COI Capita	1996–97
Christmas Drink Drive[1]	21,500	COI	3–31 December 1996

[1] These campaigns will run concurrently with those promoted in England by the Department for Education and Employment, and the Department of Transport.

I plan to run the following campaign in the next six months:

	Total cost to my Department £	Agencies	Duration
Child Road Safety[1]	19,000	COI	Approximately four weeks from 14 January 1997

[1] These campaigns will run concurrently with those promoted in England by the Department for Education and Employment, and the Department of Transport.

Publicity plans for the 1997–98 financial year have not yet been finalised.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much he estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7537]

Mr. Hague: In the current financial year, I estimate my Department will spend £300,000 on promotional and public information campaigns which involve advertising.

For previous financial years, comparable information is not readily available and can be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Publicity plans for the 1997–98 financial year have not yet been finalised, and decisions about future years' activity will be considered thereafter.

Dental Services

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) children, (b) adults and (c) people in total were registered with dentists in each health authority in Wales in (i) February 1993, (ii) July 1993, (iii) February 1994, (iv) July 1994, (v) February 1995, (vi) July 1995 and (vii) February 1996; and if he will make a statement. [7485]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 19 April 1996, Official Report, column 634.

Hospital Accident and Emergency Departments

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what have been the numbers of admissions into each hospital accident and emergency department in Wales; and what these figures are as a percentage of the busiest in the last year for which figures are available. [8014]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the number of new attendances at each accident and emergency department or casualty unit in Wales during 1995–96 and the percentage this represented of the attendances at the largest unit is given in the following table:

South East Wales Ambulance Trust

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many single-manned journeys have been made by ambulance in 1996 in the South East Wales ambulance trust region; and if he will make a statement. [7726]

Mr. Hague: The information requested is not available centrally.

NHS Trust Directors

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which non-executive directors appointed to health service trusts in Wales at the time of their establishment are still in office. [7493]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested has been placed in the Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Central Science Laboratory

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the future of the Central Science Laboratory. [8649]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Government have decided that, for the present, the Central Science Laboratory should remain as executive agency of MAFF. This will allow the CSL to consolidate its business following relocation to the new laboratory at Sand Hutton and to build on the links already established with the university of York and York bioscience initiative.

CSL's food science laboratory is to remain at Norwich and will continue to develop its collaboration with other institutes on the Norwich research park and with the university of East Anglia.

We must ensure that maximum value is obtained from the excellent new facilities at Sand Hutton. We will therefore be appointing specialists from the commercial sector to advise us on how best to achieve a secure future for CSL.

Beef Imports

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to introduce the same controls in respect of beef imports from non-EC countries as are placed on home produced beef. [6987]

Mrs. Browning: The Fresh Meat (Beef Controls) (No. 2) Regulations 1996 as amended, prohibit the sale for human consumption of any meat derived from bovine animals aged over 30 months and slaughtered on or after 29 March 1996, whether in the UK or overseas. The only exceptions are for bovine meat from non-EC countries specified in the regulations where the Government are satisfied that we can import beef without risk, and from animals slaughtered for human consumption under the beef assurance scheme.

Additionally, all consignments of fresh meat imported into the United Kingdom, whether from other member states or third countries, must have been produced in accordance with harmonised Community rules laid down in Council directive 64/433/EEC, as amended.

As regards controls on specified bovine materials, the Commission has recently put a proposal for EU-wide controls on such material to the Standing Veterinary Committee. This would also place equivalent controls on imports from third countries. The proposal was only supported only by the UK and France and is now expected to be submitted to the Council of Agriculture Ministers for further consideration.

Butter

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to protect the interests of consumers of spreadable butter; and what representations he has made to the European Commission on this matter. [7273]

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave him on 19 November 1996, Official Report, column 474, and on 4 December 1996 Official Report, column 721.

BSE

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent assessment he has made of the accuracy of the data on his Department's Internet site relating to the selective cull of cattle not over 30 months under the BSE eradication scheme. [8183]

Mr. Baldry: The Department is conscious of the importance of having accurate information across its Internet site which has until recently been available on the CCTA Government Information Service. However, during the past month we have been phasing in a dedicated MAFF service on the Internet (http://www.maff.gov.uk); this service is now fully available and contains fresh sources of information. We are also reviewing all MAFF's BSE documentation on the Internet with the aim of enhancing its content, currency and structure.

Genetically Modified Products

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the effects of using genetically manipulated (i) soya beans and (ii) other products in food production; and if he will publish his Department's conclusions. [8185]

Mrs Browning: No research has been specifically commissioned on soya beans or other genetically manipulated food products although the Department funds generic work worth some £800,000 per year to underpin its safety assessment procedures. In the course of assessing individual foods, the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes evaluates extensive safety data. The committee's findings are published in its annual report, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Peanut Products

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made towards Euro-labelling standards for peanut products. [6631]

Mrs. Browning: The EC Scientific Committee for Food has reported on the subject of food intolerance. The Standing Committee for Foodstuffs and the Codex Committee on Food Labelling discussed the problem at meetings earlier this year. We expect a Commission working group to consider the outcome and any necessary labelling rules.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if an ovine animal with the attached ear tag FO2873, was certified as fit to travel during the 24-hour period preceding the loading on to vehicles for a sailing on 22 November. [7735]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 5 December 1996]: It is not possible to tell. FO2873 would be only part of the full identification mark applied to the ovine animal. The mark applied to exported sheep also includes an individual animal identification number.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of live sheep exported between 31 May and 1 November were destined for further fattening. [7737]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 5 December 1996]: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the (a) planned expenditure in 1996–97 following the 1995 expenditure settlement, (b) estimated outturn expenditure in 1996–97 and (c) planned expenditure in 1997–98 in respect of each of the environmentally sensitive areas. [7689]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 5 December 1996]: Estimated outturn expenditure for 1996–97 is as follows:

Pennine Dales	3.166
South Downs	1.936
Somerset Levels and Moors	2.808
Broads	3.110
West Penwith	0.526
Breckland	0.812
Suffolk River Valleys	1.488
Clun	0.991
North Peak	1.458
Test Valley	0.145
North Kent Marshes	0.792
Avon Valley	0.179
South Wessex Downs	0.752
Exmoor	1.720
South West Peak	1.539
Lake District	5.730
Blackdown Hills	0.361
Cotswold Hills	2.068
Dartmoor	0.861
Essex Coast	0.350
Shropshire Hills	0.509
Upper Thames Tributaries	0.502
Total	31.803

The financial provision for environmentally sensitive areas is as follows:

1996–97(1995 PES provision): £37.02 million

1997–98(1996 PES provision): £33.69 million

The financial provision is not allocated between individual ESAs.

All figures relate to payments to farmers in English ESAs.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much his Department plans to spend on celebrating Christmas and the new year. [7576]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 6 December 1996]: I estimate that my Department will be spending just under £3,000 on celebrating Christmas and the new year.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Servants (Impartiality)

8. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what recent consultations he has had with the Cabinet Secretary concerning regulations protecting the political neutrality of the civil service during pre-election periods. [6502]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie).

Deregulation (Competition)

13. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what countries he has visited for the purpose of studying (a) deregulation and (b) competition policy. [6509]

Mr. Freeman: I have sought support for reducing the burden of European legislation from Ministers and business leaders in most EU member states. Working with our European partners for better EC legislation is vital for improving the competitiveness of UK business.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the impact of deregulation upon the competitive position of the British economy. [6516]

Mr. Freeman: The Government's commitment to fewer, better and simpler regulations is making a key contribution to the UK's competitiveness. Deregulation measures are now saving business hundreds of millions of pounds each year and helping to attract increasing investment from overseas.

Deregulation (Safety Implications)

14. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the effect on safety at work of deregulation. [6512]

Mr. Freeman: Changes are being made which will simplify and clarify the law without reducing necessary standards. These stem from the Health and Safety Commission's own review of regulation.

Civil Servants (Numbers)

15. Mr. Spring: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister by what percentage the number of civil servants has changed in the past five years. [6513]

Mr. Willetts: On 1 October 1991, there were 567,000 civil servants. There are now 487,000, a fall of 14 per cent.

Government Policy

16. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what was the principal Government policy with which he was concerned in the week beginning 2 December. [6514]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have continued to work on a full range of those Government policies for which I am responsible.

Policy Co-ordination

17. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the mechanisms for the co-ordination of Government (i) European, (ii) economic and (iii) education policy since his appointment. [6515]

The Deputy Prime Minister: The Cabinet Committee structure is regularly reviewed to ensure that it facilitates the successful co-ordination of Government business.

Deregulation (Fiches d'impact)

19. Mr. Steen: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what representations the deregulation unit at his Department has made to the Commission about the content of the fiches d'impact. [6517]

Mr. Freeman: It is vital that the European Commission accurately assesses the costs to business of European legislative proposals. On 29 October 1996, I wrote to the Secretary General of the Commission and to Commissioners setting out the improvements the UK wants to see in the fiche d'impact assessment system. A copy of the paper I sent has been placed in the Library of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing and Council Tax Benefits

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have received (a) extended housing benefit and (b) extended council tax benefit when leaving (i) income support and (ii) jobseeker's allowance; and what is his estimate of the cost in each case. [6729]

Mr. Roger Evans: Information concerning the number of people who have received an extended payment of housing benefit and council tax benefit will be available early next year. Information on the number of recipients who left income support or jobseeker's allowance and the cost in each case is not collected.

Benefit Recipients

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for (a) incapacity benefit, (b) disability living allowance and (c) the jobseeker's allowance, the 10 United Kingdom parliamentary constituencies with the highest number of recipients and the 10 with the lowest number, together with the two Northern Ireland constituencies with the highest number and the two with the lowest, stating for each constituency the percentage of the electorate who are recipients. [7204]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

For information on Northern Ireland constituencies, I refer the hon. and learned Member to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Norther Ireland.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many decisions on an initial award of (a) disability living allowance care component and (b) disability living allowance mobility component were made where the adjudication officer (i) required an examining medical officer's report, (ii) required a general practitioner's factual report, (iii) required other evidence and (iv) relied on the claim pack alone, in (1) 1992–93, (2) 1993–94, (3) 1994–95 and (4) 1995–96. [6723]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is in the table:

Notes:
[1] Claims for disability living allowance, care and/or mobility components are decided in the light of all the evidence. The claim pack also invites a claimant to provide supporting statements from someone who knows how their disability affects their every day life e.g. from a doctor or social worker.
[2] Includes top-up awards.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people during the past year have claimed the disability living allowance mobility component where the adjudication officer considered a claim for the higher rate; in how many cases claims were decided by (a) a general practitioner's factual report and (b) an examining practitioner's report; and how many claims have been refused. [6724]

Mr. Mitchell: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

[6728]

Mr. Mitchell: None. There is insufficient information on which to base a reliable estimate.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) men and (b) women receive disability living allowance but have no income maintenance benefit in payment. [6730]

Mr. Mitchell: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Benefits Agency (Automatic Payments)

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what report he has received from the Benefits Agency on the consequences of the failure of its automatic credit transfer system to maintain payment of benefits. [6628]

Mr. Roger Evans: Briefing as events occurred was received by Ministers.

Cold Weather Payments Scheme

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received regarding the cold weather payments scheme. [7696]

Mr. Roger Evans: Since 4 November, there have been four letters—all from hon. Members.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost to his Department of the cold weather payments scheme in each year since it was introduced. [7695]

Mr. Evans: The information is set out in the table:

Year	Expenditure[1] (£000s)

Pensions

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of people who opted out of (a) the state earnings-related pension scheme and (b) occupational pension schemes in favour of private personal pension schemes and who have made no further contributions to the private schemes since the year in which they opted out. [7494]

Mr. Heald: The available information is in the table.

The table indicates the number of people who had an appropriate personal pension scheme at the end of 1994–95, where the Department has made a minimum contribution payment into the individual's APP in the first year of the scheme, and then made no further payments. The figures are broken down into the previous type of pension scheme.

Notes:
1. — = Nil or negligible.
2. APP = Appropriate personal pension.
3. Minimum contribution—a proportion of national insurance contributions paid into an APP by the DSS.
4. Qualification for SERPS is defined as having earnings over the lower earnings limit in the year.
5. "Other" will include those receiving NI credits, paying class 2 contributions, class 3 contributions, new entrants (i.e. at 16 years old), and any combinations of categories.
6. Because all figures are rounded to the nearest thousand, the sum of the amounts in the individual columns may not agree with the amount shown against the total.

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those Organisations for Economic Co-operation and Development countries other than the United Kingdom which place geographical limitations on the payment of fully uprated retirement pensions to citizens who have contributed to a state contributory pension scheme. [8187]

Mr. Heald: On the basis of the information available to the Department, none.

However, other forms of restriction on payment outside national territories are practised by some other OECD countries.

Disability Access Rights Advice Service

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the introduction of the disability access rights advice service; and what is its estimated annual cost. [7757]

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) on 6 November, Official Report, column 547.

National Insurance

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 21 November, Official Report, columns 598–600, on national insurance, what estimate he has made of the administrative costs additional to national insurance benefit expenditure for (a) flat-rate retirement pensions, (b) additional pensions and (c) other benefits for the years (i) 1995–96, (ii) 2000–01, (iii) 2010–11, (iv) 2020–21 and (v) 2030–31 if the administrative costs incurred in 1995–96 applied proportionately in subsequent years. Child Support

Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many inspectors have been appointed by him since 5 April to investigate child support cases involving self-employed absent parents. [8122]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide a breakdown by ethnic origin of parents with care against whom reduced benefit directions were issued in 1995–96. [8125]

Mr. Mitchell: The information is not available.

Child Poverty

Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Secuirty if he will update his answer of 19 December 1995, Official Report, columns 1118–19, giving the number of children in families who are (a) dependent on income support and (b) in receipt of family credit, by region. [8182]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables.

HEALTH

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what promotional and public information campaigns his Department is (a) currently running and (b) planning to run during the next six months; and for each campaign (i) how much it will cost, (1) in total and (2) to his Department, (ii) what agencies or bodies are undertaking the work and (iii) what is its planned duration. [7406]

Mr. Horam: Promotional and public information campaigns run by the Department are described as multi-media campaigns containing national and/or regional advertising. The total estimated cost of these campaigns is £3,488,000 in 1996–97, of which £1,335,000 is for advertising. In addition, the Department runs a number of other publicity campaigns, for example health of the nation, overseas travel and help with health costs. These use a wide range of different media, including publications, videos, teleresponse lines and exhibitions. Decisions have not been made on the use of national and/or regional advertising for 1997–98. Other information requested for the current year is in the table.

Campaign	Advertising Agency	Planned duration
Maternity	Ogilvy and Mather	2 weeks
Health services	Media System Ltd.	All year
Professional recruitment	Saatchi and Saatchi	2 weeks
National Blood publicity	Euro RSCG Wnek Gosper	2 x 3 weeks
	Mustoe Merrimann	2 weeks

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much he estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7534]

Mr. Horam: Promotional and public information campaigns run by the Department are described as multi-media campaigns containing national and/or regional advertising. In addition, the Department runs a number of other publicity campaigns, for example, keep warm keep well, overseas travel and help with health costs. These use a wide range of different media including publications, videos, teleresponse lines and exhibitions. Decisions have not been made on the 1997–98 publicity programme. Other information for campaigns which include national and/or regional advertising is in the table.

Polio Vaccinations

Sir Julian Critchley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the number of children presently being vaccinated against polio. [7492]

Mr. Horam: Approximately 600,000 children under the age of two in England are immunised against polio each year. Provisional figures for 1995–96 show that 96 per cent. of children in England were immunised against polio by their second birthday. The World Health Organisation has recognised the United Kingdom as one of the countries which have eliminated indigenous polio due to wild virus. The Government are now working to assemble the necessary data to earn a WHO certificate of eradication as part of the programme for the global eradication of polio by 2000.

Personal Social Services

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the amounts (i) in cash term and (ii) in real terms and (b) the percentage changes in the funding for personal social services for each of the last five years and the projected figures for the next three years. [7478]

Mr. Burns: The information requested is set out:

	Cash (£ million)	Annual percentage change	Real terms (£ million at 1996–97 prices)
1992–93	4,850	—	5,320
1993–94	5,585	+15.2	5,954

1996–97	7,536	+8.2	7,536
1997–98	7,846	+4.1	7,692

There are no projected figures for 1998–99 and 1999–2000.

General Medical Services Practice Nurses

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general medical services practice nurses there were in (a) 1990 and (b) 1995 in (i) Sheffield, (ii) Barnsley, (iii) Doncaster and (iv) Rotherham. [8102]

Mr. Malone: The answer is shown in the table.

Latex Allergy

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what investigations his Department is making into the incidence of latex allergy. [6629]

Mr. Horam: The Medical Devices Agency—MDA—has a system for investigating adverse incidents associated with all medical devices, including those manufactured from natural rubber latex. In April 1996, the MDA published a device bulletin entitled "Latex Sensitisation in the Health Care Setting (Use of Latex Gloves)", copies of which are available in the Library.

Peanut Allergy

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department has prepared for environmental health officers on promoting awareness of the dangers of peanut allergy. [6632]

Mr. Horam: The Department is currently reconsidering its advice on peanut allergy, particularly in respect of consumption of peanuts or products containing peanuts by young children. To that end, we are commissioning work by an expert group who will convene in January 1997 and should be in a position to report by mid-1997.

Paracetamol

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to publicise the inquiry into the labelling, prescribing and sale of products containing paracetamol; and if he will make a statement. [7501]

Mr. Malone: There has been wide publicity. On 22 November 1996, a press release was issued to announce the commencement of a public consultation exercise, seeking views on label warnings and pack sizes of paracetamol available without prescription. The announcement received prominent media coverage. The consultation letter giving details of proposals has been sent to 245 professional bodies, consumer organisations and marketing authorisation holders. Articles and commentaries have been carried by medical and pharmaceutical journals and the trades press as well as national newspapers.

Anti-drugs Policies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of anti-drugs policies in reducing the consumption of (a) alcohol, (b) tobacco, (c) medicinal drugs, (d) ecstasy, (e) ketamine, (f) heroin and (g) cannabis. [7502]

Mr. Malone: Concerning illegal drug misuse, I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council gave my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) on 13 May, Official Report, columns 341–42.

The Government's policies to prevent the misuse of alcohol and reduce the consumption of tobacco are subject to continuing evaluation.

The misuse of ketamine, which is not currently a controlled drug, is kept under review.

Matters relating to the prescription of medicinal drugs are for clinicians, who are expected to follow the general guidance which is available, especially that in the British National Formulary, copies of which are available in the Library.

Health Authority Expenditure

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each health authority its distance from weighted capitation target for 1997–98. [7936]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) on 3 December 1996, Official Report, column 638.

Challenge Fund Bids

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if those bids for centenary care challenge fund approval for 1996–97 will also receive funding in 1997–98. [7938]

Mr. Burns: Arrangements for the continuing care challenge fund are set out in EL(96)109, copies of which are available in the Library; £16 million is available to support continuing health care schemes in 1996–97 and £20 million, to be matched by £40 million from health and/or local authorities, will be available for 1997–98. Health authorities have been asked to submit, separately, bids for funds for 1996–97 by 13 December 1996 and by 24 January 1997 for further funds in 1997–98.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what priority will be given to health authorities over their weighted capitation target for mental health challenge fund money in 1997–98. [7940]

Mr. Burns: None. The criteria for assessing bids against the fund are set out in EL(96) 109 issued to chief executives of health authorities and NHS trusts on 29 November 1996.

NHS Trust Finance

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the forecast (a) annual income (b) expenditure and (c) operational surplus or deficit at the end of 1996–97 for each NHS trust based on their 1996–97 second quarter returns to the NHS executive; and what is the forecast retained surplus or deficit for each trust at the end of 1996–97 based on these returns and taking account of (i) profit or loss on fixed assets, (ii) net interest receivable or payable and (iii) public dividend capital payable. [7957]

Mr. Malone: The 1996–97 financial information based on forecasts at quarter 2 will be placed in the Library shortly.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his oral answer of 3 December, Official Report, column 779, if he will list the name of the trust and value of the deficit of (a) each of the 16 NHS trusts which recorded real retained deficits in 1994–95, (b) each of the 10 of those NHS trusts which remained in real deficit in 1995–96 and (c) each of the five of those NHS trusts which are forecast to show a further deficit in 1996–97. [7959]

Mr. Malone: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Trusts which recorded real deficits in 1994–95

Contraception

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information is available through the common information core element of the "The Health of the Nation" strategy monitoring programme of the NHS executive as to (a) the number of girls aged under 16 years contacting general medical practitioners for contraceptives and (b) the number of girls aged under 16 years contacting family planning clinics in each of the last three years for which figures are available; and if he will give a breakdown of those figures by health authority. [7834]

Mr. Horam: The information requested will be placed in the Library.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether it remains his policy not to collect information centrally about contraception and teenage women; and what assessment he has made of the consistency of that policy with the terms of the letter from the NHS executive headquarters dated 12 November to Mrs. Victoria Gillick; [7835]

(2) what assessment he has made of the statement in the letter from the NHS executive dated 12 November to Mrs. Victoria Gillick that common information core data relating to first contacts, including those involving conception rates and contraceptives, is collected as part of the NHS executive's performance management framework. [7836]

Mr. Horam: Some information is collected centrally about contraception and teenage women. I will write to my hon. Friend about this and the letter from the national health service executive headquarters dated 12 November to Mrs. Victoria Gillick.

Bridge Child Care Development Scheme

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to fund the Bridge child care development scheme for the next financial year. [7937]

Mr. Burns: The Bridge child care consultancy service is, as its name implies, a consultancy management service which local authorities commission in the normal way. I have no plans to commission the Bridge to undertake any work for the Department of Health at present.

Intensive and High Dependency Care

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if those bids for funding of adult intensive and high dependency care approved for 1996–97 will also receive funding in 1997–98. [7939]

Mr. Horam: Yes.

North Yorkshire Ambulance Service

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when (a) he and (b) other Ministers in his Department last met (i) the chairman and (ii) the chief executive of the North Yorkshire Ambulance Service NHS trust. [7956]

Mr. Horam: Ministers have had no recent meetings with the North Yorkshire Ambulance Service NHS trust, but the national health service executive continues to have regular meetings with the trust.

Health Authority Finance

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the forecast annual (a) income and (b) expenditure at the end of the 1996–97 financial year for each health authority based on the 1996–97 second quarter statements of income and expenditure submitted to the NHS executive by these health authorities and trusts. [7958]

Mr. Malone: The information requested will be placed in the Library shortly.

Asylum

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated cost to local authorities of changes in the rules governing asylum in the United Kingdom over the last year; and if he will make a statement. [7506]

Mr. Burns: The information requested is not available centrally.

Health Spending (North Kirklees)

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the total expenditure per head of population in the north Kirklees area by Calderdale and Kirklees health authority, with particular reference to hospital community health services and general medical services; [8218]

(2) What proportion of the £271 million he recently announced as the allocation for Calderdale and Kirklees area health authority will be spent on the population of north Kirklees. [8219]

Mr. Horam: This information is not held centrally. I refer my hon. Friend to Mr. Allan Templeton, chairman of Calderdale and Kirklees health authority.

Purchasing Authorities

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he gives to purchasing authorities in England on how often they should check variations in their spending patterns so that they reflect variations in assessed need. [8217]

Mr. Horam: Health authorities are expected to develop and review purchasing plans to reflect the needs of their local populations within the national context set out in the NHS priorities and planning guidance. These plans are subject to public consultation before being agreed in corporate contracts with NHS executive regional offices.

Learning Disabilities

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the percentage of the total budget for each health authority spent on services for people with learning disabilities for the latest available year. [4806]

Mr. Burns [holding answer 20 November 1996]: The percentage of the total budget spent on services for people with learning disabilities for each health authority in 1995–96 will be placed in the Library.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Non-departmental Public Bodies

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many non-departmental public bodies there are; what percentage of appointments to these bodies are held by (a) women and (b) members of ethnic minorities; and when the annual list of such bodies will be published. [8816]

Mr. Freeman: These figures are set out in the Cabinet Office—OPS—booklet "Public Bodies 1996", which is published today. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House. I am pleased to say that on 1 April 1996 there were 1,194 non-departmental public bodies—a fall of 33, or 2.7 per cent. since 1995, and of 973, or 45 per cent. since 1979. As of 1 September 1996, 31 per cent. of appointments to these bodies were held by women and 3.3 per cent. by members of the ethnic minorities; both of these are increases on the relevant figures for the previous year. This shows the success of the Government's policies of increasing equality of opportunity in public life, while at the same time reducing the size of the public sector overall.

Staff Contracts

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his answer of 28 November, Official Report, columns 347–49, on staff numbers, how many (a) permanent and (b) non-permanent staff there have been in (i) his Department and (ii) executive agencies of his Department in each year since 1992. [7849]

Mr. Willetts: This answer covers the Cabinet Office, Office of Public Service, its executive agencies, HMSO and the Central Office of Information. We do not hold a complete record of the requested information but the figures we have are as follows:

The Cabinet Office has been affected by several machinery of government changes over this period and it is therefore not realistic to make comparisons between years.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Japan (Dolphins)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the issue of cruelty to dolphins in Japanese waters during the event known as iruka no oikami ryo at forthcoming international conferences; what representations he has made to the Japanese Government on this issue; and if he will make a statement. [7727]

Dr. Liam Fox: No representations have been made to the Japanese Government on this issue.

Whitehall Building

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his proposals for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office building, Whitehall. [8189]

Mr. Hanley: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office building—Old Public Offices, Whitehall—is being refurbished for the first time since construction was completed in 1875 to provide modern office accommodation for the long term needs of this Department. On completion in January 1997 it will provide 25 per cent. more space allowing leased buildings to be given up, thus reducing running costs and improving operational efficiency.

Nicaragua

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the recent elections in Nicaragua; and if he will make a statement. [8190]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: As I told the House on 19 November, Official Report, column 459, independent observers concluded that the elections in Nicaragua, although not flawless, were conducted in a fair and transparent manner and contributed to the further consolidation of democracy. We share that view.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8536]

Mr. Hanley: There was one such appointment.

PRIME MINISTER

Knighthoods

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Prime Minister how many knighthoods have been awarded to (a) Conservative and (b) Labour hon. Members in each year since November 1979. [8444]

The Prime Minister: One hundred and thirty Conservative and four Labour hon. members have received knighthoods since 1979. Successive leaders of the Labour party have refused to recommend awards for political services.

Engagements

Sir Pater Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December. [7002]

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December. [7001]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Prime Minister how much will be spent on Christmas trees and decorations for his official residences at (a) Chequers and (b) Downing street; how many Christmas trees will be bought for these two residences; and what are the types and county of origin of the trees. [7566]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The British Christmas Tree Growers Association has donated one Christmas tree, and three others have been donated by the Chequers estate. Approximately £460 has been spent on decorations for Downing street. Similar information for Chequers is a matter for the trustee's.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Prime Minister how much his office plans to spend on celebrating Christmas and the new year. [7588]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 6 December 1996]: As far as I am aware, none.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Human Genetics Advisory Commission

Mr. Alton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if the Human Genetics Advisory Commission will include industrialists with a direct interest in the development of genetics; [8243]

(2) how the Human Genetics Advisory Commission will be financed; and what will be the remuneration for the chairman and members; [8241]

(3) for what reasons no lay representation has been included in the membership of the Human Genetics Advisory Commission; [8245]

(4) what criteria were used to select members of the new Human Genetics Advisory Commission; and if he will (a) publish and (b) place in the Library, details of their curricula vitae; [8240]

(5) when membership of the Human Genetic Advisory Commission will next be reviewed; [8244]

(6) what account he took of dissenting views about genetic engineering in appointing the members of the Human Genetics Advisory Commission. [8242]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) on 2 December, Official Report, columns 488–89, announcing the membership of this new body.

The advisory commission is intended to take a broad perspective on the implications of human genetics, rather than represent the interests of any particular group. Members have been chosen on their own merits, in consultation with the public appointments unit, and represent between them informed and interested opinion on developments in genetics. Their curriculum vitae have been provided on a personal and confidential basis. Lay members have been included.

The advisory commission is a non-executive body with a joint secretariat provided by the Office of Science and Technology and the Department of Health. Appointments are for two years in the first instance. Members' expenses will be paid.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his Department has signed the Melbourne declaration on injury prevention and control, adopted on 22 February. [7945]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The third international conference on injury prevention, held in Melbourne in February 1996, brought together representatives of the international injury prevention and control community, but was not an intergovernmental conference.

The so-called "Melbourne declaration", adopted by the conference, addresses certain recommendations to Governments, among others, but does not provide for formal endorsement by Governments of its conclusions.

Public Holidays

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many public holidays there were in each of the past five years in (a) Wales, (b) Scotland, (c) Northern Ireland, (d) England, (e) the Netherlands, (f) France and (g) Italy. [7497]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 9 December 1996]: The information requested is shown in the following table:

	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996
England	8	8	8	8	8
Wales	8	8	8	8	8
Scotland[1]	8	8	8	8[2]	8
N.Ireland	10	10	10	10	10
Netherlands[3]	9	9	8	8	8
Italy	10	10	10	10	9[4]
France	11	11	11	11	11

Official Journals of the European Communities.

Notes:

[1] Subject to regional, local and institutional variations.

[2] There was an additional bank holiday on the 8 May 1995 to link with commemorative arrangements for the 50th anniversary of VE Day. This was in addition to the existing 1 May 1995 bank holiday; in practice, most employers in Scotland observed one of these two holidays.

[3] Liberation day (5 May) is observed in the civil service and by some trade groups. It is listed as a public holiday in the "Official Journal of the European Communities" in some years but not others.

[4] Immaculate Conception Day (8 December) is not listed as a holiday in the "Official Journal of the European Communities" for 1996 but remains a public holiday in Italy.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what occasions Mr. A, whose name has been supplied to him, advised the DTI on Synex Ltd.'s application for regional selective assistance. [6236]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 27 November 1996]: In respect of the application by Synex Ltd. Mr. A provided written accountancy advice on three occasions, through reports dated 7 January 1995, 19 January 1995 and 22 February 1995. Mr. A however ceased to be retained by the Department as an advisor before appraisal of all aspects of the case was completed. The accountancy aspects of the case were therefore fully reviewed by the Department's central industrial development unit.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what dates the South-West industrial development board discussed the application of Synex Ltd. for regional selective assistance; and which members were present. [6229]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 27 November 1996]: The application was referred to at five meetings of the board. Three of these, on 21 December 1994, 12 April 1995 and 28 June 1995, were simply reports on the receipt of the application or its progress. The application was discussed substantially at two meetings held on 25 January 1995 and 22 February 1995 when the board members present were as follows:

25 January 1995

Mr. R. Harris (Chairman)

Mr. N. Falls

Mr. P. Gregory

Mr. M. Jordan

Mr. A. Loze

22 February 1995

Mr. R. Harris (Chairman)

Mr. N. Falls

Mr. P. Gregory

Mr. M. Jordan

Mr. A. Loze

Mr. V. Parsons

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what declarations of interest (a) Mr. B and (b) Mr. C, whose names have been supplied to him, made at meetings of the South-West industrial development board to discuss the application of Synex Ltd. for regional selective assistance; and on which occasions they left meetings where a conflict of interest might arise. [6235]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 27 November 1996]: It is not recorded that Mr. B made a declaration of interest in the application by Synex Ltd.

At the meeting of the SWIDB held on 21 December 1994 members were informed about an imminent application from Synex Ltd. Mr. C declared immediately he had an interest in the case. Mr. C did not attend the meeting on 25 January 1995 when the application by Synex Ltd. was first substantively discussed, and absented himself from the discussion which took place on 22 February. The two subsequent meetings on 12 April and 28 June were essentially updating the board about progress of the case and it was not felt necessary for Mr. C to withdraw.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what factors underlay the decisions by (a) DTI South-East to award a regional selective assistance grant to Synex Ltd. and (b) DTI South-West to refuse such a grant; [6232]

(2) what factors underlay the refusal by his Department's south-west office to award a regional selective assistance grant to Synex Ltd. [6233]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 27 November 1996]: Each application for regional selective assistance is determined on its merits against the common criteria for the scheme, which are explained in the Department's brochure, "Investing in the Assisted Areas", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. The project as presented to Government office SW was judged not to have satisfied the criteria.

Funeral Pre-payment Plans

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the consumer protection regime governing the market for funeral pre-payment plans sold by companies to elderly people on the endorsement of registered charities. [7456]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 9 December 1996]: I addressed this matter in the recent consultation paper published by my Department in July on pre-paid funerals. The question of endorsements by registered charities in England and Wales is a matter for the Charity Commission. Charities are also subject to regulation in Scotland through the Scottish charities office. Advertisements featuring such endorsements are subject to controls by the Advertising Standards Authority. In the consultation document, it was proposed that the nature of the relationship between the plan provider and the charity—or the charity's trading subsidiary—should be made clear to the customer. I am currently reviewing the responses on this and the rest of the proposals.

Car Production

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cars were produced in the United Kingdom in each year since 1979 by (i) United Kingdom companies and (ii) United Kingdom-owned companies. [7827]

Mr. Greg Knight [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Figures showing the number of cars produced in the United Kingdom each year, including production by company, are published by the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders Ltd. whose publication, 'World Automotive Statistics', with figures for the years in question, are available in the Library of the House. The ownership of UK car manufacturers may also be derived from commercial databases such as The Financial Times "Profile" also available in the Library of the House. However, assembling the information on UK-owned car manufacturers for this time period could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Cotton Fabric

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will make a statement on duties on cotton loomstate imports of cloth from (a) China, (b) Egypt, (c) India, (d) Indonesia, (e) Pakistan and (f) Turkey; if he will list the levels of import duties; when those duties came into effect; and for what reasons they were introduced; [8267]

(2) if he will make it his policy to renegotiate import duties on cotton fabrics from (a) China, (b) Egypt, (c) India, (d) Indonesia, (e) Pakistan and (f) Turkey; and what discussions his Department has had on these matters with the European Commission; [8269]

(3) what assessment he has made as to the extent to which European Union demand for 72 by 96, 30's/30's cc 4 by 1 weft sateen 50 inch and 56 inch, 100 per cent. cotton fabric and 140 by 48, 30's/10's cc 5 by 1 warp satin 50 inch and 59 inch, 100 per cent. cotton fabric exceeds European Union manufactured supply of these fabrics; and if he will make a statement; [8271]

(4) what recent representations he has received from those in the textile and clothing industries about the effect of recent increases in import duties on cotton fabrics; what assessment he has made of the impact of increased costs associated with such duties on profitability and company viability in the British textile and clothing sector; and if he will make a statement; [8268]

(5) what studies his Department undertook prior to the imposition of higher import duties on cotton fabrics from (a) China, (b) Egypt, (c) India, (d) Indonesia, (e) Pakistan and (f) Turkey on the extent to which the fabrics could be sourced within the European Union; and if he will make a statement. [8270]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 9 December 1996]: On 21 November 1996 the European Commission imposed provisional anti-dumping duties for six months on imports of unbleached cotton fabrics from China, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Pakistan and Turkey. The duty rates are set out in Commission Regulation (EC) No. 2208/96 of 18 November 1996 published in the Official Journal of the European Communities No. L295 of 20 November 1996. This is available in the Library of the House. The decision followed the Commission's preliminary investigation of a complaint that the products were being dumped in the Community by the countries concerned.

At this provisional stage, the Commission is obliged to consult member states but is able to impose duties on its own authority. My Department has received a considerable number of representations against the measures from companies in the textiles finishing sector and from the British Apparel and Textiles Confederation. Accordingly, and in the light of our own analysis, we told the Commission that we strongly opposed the duties because the adverse effects would far outweigh any benefits to EU producers of cotton fabrics.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade raised the mater personally with Sir Leon Brittan. Although Sir Leon ultimately decided to authorise the provisional duties, he has undertaken to carry out a thorough analysis of the balance of interests before deciding whether to propose that they be made definitive. The UK will vote against any such proposal, which to be implemented would require the support of a simple majority of member states. At present, the indications are that no such majority exists.

ENVIRONMENT

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what promotional and public information campaigns his Department is (a) currently running and (b) planning to run during the next six months; and for each campaign (i) how much it will cost, (1) in total and (2) to his Department, (ii) what agencies or bodies are undertaking the work and (iii) what is its planned duration. [7412]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department produces a range of public information programmes related to its policy responsibilities. Advertising is placed through the Central Office of Information and other publicity work is competitively tendered using a variety of suppliers. Estimated publicity expenditure for the current financial year by subject area is as follows:

Environmental and Energy Efficiency	2,509
Sustainable Development	2,200
Urban Regeneration and Private Finance	308
Competitiveness and the Environment	272
Housing	250
Planning	200
Water	77
Construction sponsorship	53
Property and Building	32
Total	5,901

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much his Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much he estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7535]

Current planned expenditure for 1996–97 is £5.9 million. Plans for 1997–98 have yet to be finalised.

Sir Paul Beresford: The figures for expenditure on public information campaigns in each of the last five years are detailed in the table:

	£000
1991–92	2,700
1992–93	14,697
1993–94	12,108
1994–95	8,878
1995–96	7,383

Beaches

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each year since 1991 those beaches in each region which complied with the EU bathing water standard guide for (a) total and faecal coliforms, (b) faecal streptococci, and (c) coliforms and faecal streptococci combined. [7434]

Mr. Clappison: The information requested has been placed in the Library of the House because of the volume of data involved.

Tooting Bec Psychiatric Hospital

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make a decision on the proposals for the development of the former Tooting Bec psychiatric hospital site. [7643]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Secretary of State has decided, on the information before him, not to exercise his powers under section 77 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 and call in the planning application to develop housing on the former Tooting Bec hospital site.

Asbestos

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to ensure that products which contain asbestos are individually and permanently marked as such. [7900]

Sir Paul Beresford: The requirements regarding the labelling of products containing asbestos are laid down in the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1985 as amended in 1992 and the Asbestos Products (Safety) Regulations 1985 as amended in 1987. There are no plans to introduce any further labelling measures at present.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures the Government have taken to encourage the use of substitutes for asbestos-containing products. [7898]

Sir Paul Beresford: Existing legal measures encourage the use of substitutes for products containing asbestos. These range from widespread prohibitions on the supply of products containing asbestos to those which govern the use of asbestos at work. The Health and Safety Executive and local authorities continue to enforce these regulations, and in particular regulation 8 of the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987 which requires every employer to prevent exposure to asbestos by substitution with safer materials where reasonably practicable.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what statistics he has collated on levels of asbestos use in London since 1986. [7902]

Sir Paul Beresford: No statistics on the levels of asbestos use in London since 1986 have been collated by the Department of the Environment.

Gipsy Sites

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many schemes for permanent gipsy sites agreed under the former gipsy site policy he is currently obliged to finance; and if the financial arrangements apply only to agreements made under the former policy. [7782]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: There remains 88 schemes for permanent gipsy sites which were submitted by local authorities before the power to pay gipsy sites grant—section 70 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980—was repealed on 3 November 1994. Of those, 83 have received formal grant approval from the Secretary of State; the remaining five have yet to be determined. The power to pay grant applies only to applications submitted in accordance with departmental guidance issued to local authorities under the 1980 Act.

Marine Pollution

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what communications he has had with the Marine Conservation Society in regard to pollution arising from the offshore oil and gas industry. [7894]

Mr. Clappison: My colleagues and I have had no communications with the Marine Conservation Society on that issue.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what licences to discharge radioactive materials, collected during operations, to sea have been issued to offshore oil and gas exploration drilling and storage platforms. [8359]

Mr. Clappison: Authorisations to discharge to sea the materials containing naturally occurring radionuclides arising during offshore oil and gas exploration, drilling and storage operations are issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993. The Environment Agency holds records of authorisations issued for the English and Welsh sectors on the public register at its Warrington office—Richard Fairclough house, Knutsford road, Warrington, WA4 1HG. The Scottish Environment Protection Agency holds records of authorisations issued for the Scottish sector at its Aberdeen office—Greyhope house, Greyhope road, Torry, Aberdeen, AB11 9RD.

Health and Safety

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many health and safety inspectors there were in (a) 1986 and (b) 1995. [7901]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Health and Safety Executive employed the following number of health and safety inspectors in:

Year (1 April)	Number of inspectors
1986	1,231.50
1995	1,477.60

Figures given are full-time equivalent counts: part-timers were counted as half units until 1 April 1995; since then they are counted on the basis of the proportion of a full week that they work. For information there are also a broadly comparable number employed by local authorities.

Environmental Information Appeals Tribunal

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what immediate plans he has to seek an early parliamentary opportunity to introduce legislation to establish an environmental information appeals tribunal. [7932]

Mr. Clappison: I have no immediate plans to introduce legislation to establish an environmental information appeals tribunal. The recently published first report of the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities on freedom of access to information on the environment recommends different procedures, which are being carefully considered.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how much his Department will spend on Christmas trees and decorations this year; how many Christmas trees will be bought for his Department's headquarters; and what are the type and country of origin of the trees; [7557]

(2) how much his Department plans to spend on celebrating Christmas and the new year. [7581]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Total expenditure by my Department, including its agencies and the Health and Safety Commission and the Health and Safety Executive on Christmas trees and decorations is expected to be around £3,000. This includes one tree bought for the Department's headquarters building in Marsham street. It has not been possible to determine the type and country of origin of every tree, but all those can be verified, including the tree in Marsham street, an English spruce are British. Beyond that and official Christmas cards, the Department is not planning to spend any more money celebrating Christmas or the new year.

Local Government Finance

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated pool for England of total receipts from national non-domestic rates in 1997–98; what the pool was in 1996–97; what the pool was in 1996–97; what is the estimated grant from the pool in 1997–98 to the county councils of (a) Somerset, (b) Devon and (c) Dorset; and what was the grant for (a) to (c) for the national non-domestic rating pool in 1996–97. [8065]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) on 27 November, Official Report, columns 242–44.

The amounts to be distributed from the pool in 1996–97, and the provisional amounts for 1997–98, for the county councils listed, are as follows:

£ million

	1996–97	1997–98
Somerset county council	98.200	93.555
Devon county council	216.439	205.917
Dorset county council	138.277	73.691

The figure for Dorset CC for 1997–98 take account of reorganisation at 1 April 1997.

Oil Pollution

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the long-term ecological implications of the discharge of oil-based drilling mud from the North Cormorant platform in April 1989. [8357]

Mr. Clappison: None.

Genetically engineered Crops

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many genetically engineered crops are permitted to be grown in the United States. [7841]

Mr. Clappison: The Secretary of State has granted 99 consents for specific trials of genetically modified engineered crops in Great Britain since the Genetically Modified Organisms (Deliberate Release) Regulations 1992—as amended in 1995—came into force on 1 February 1993. The information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. Three genetically modified crops have been authorised to be grown throughout the European Union under the marketing provisions of Council directive 90/220/EEC.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what restrictions there are on the importation of genetically engineered crops into the United Kingdom. [7842]

Mr. Clappison: The importation and marketing of genetically modified engineered crops in Great Britain are controlled by part VI of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and regulations made under it, in particular for import the Genetically Modified Organisms (Risk Assessment) (Records and Exemption) Regulations 1996, as amended in 1995. The information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8538]

Sir Paul Beresford: The public appointments unit is a valuable source of candidates. No central record is maintained of the sources of names of appointees and in some cases they may have been nominated from more than one source. I regret that the information cannot be provided in the form requested.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Computers

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee what has been the total cost to date of cabling the parliamentary estate for access to the parliamentary data and video network; what is the estimated cost of completing the cabling; what estimate he has made of the impact on hon. Members' office cost allowances of hon. Members upgrading their computer systems to make use of the PDVN network; for what reasons the Director of Communications has refused to connect to the PDVN machines using Microsoft Windows 95; and if he will make a statement on problems encountered. [8342]

Mr. Waller: The cabling for the parliamentary data and video network—PDVN—is being installed in conjunction with electrical rewiring, telephone cable renewal and associated asbestos removal, and it is not possible to give a meaningful figure for the cost of the PDVN cabling alone.

The pace of change in information technology inevitably means that desktop equipment may have to be updated at intervals if hon. Members wish to have access to the full range of enhanced services available on the PDVN. Guidance on the most appropriate systems for connection to the PDVN, making effective use of resources available from the office costs allowance, is given by the Director of Communications on request.

The Director of Communications encourages the continued use of Windows 3.11, while the reliability of network use of Windows 95 is being assessed, but recognises that increasing numbers of new machines purchased by hon. Members come with Windows 95 installed and will arrange for connection of Windows 95 machines to the PDVN. Connection of Windows 95 machines to the PDVN via modem is, however, currently not available, due to technical incompatibilities. Changes to the PDVN are currently being tested with a view to offering this service in the new year.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Children Act Advisory Committee

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the future of the Children Act Advisory Committee. [8815]

Mr. Streeter: On 14 May 1996, during the passage of the Family Law Bill through Parliament, my right hon. and noble friend the Lord Chancellor announced his intention to set up a new advisory board for five years to monitor the implementation of the Family Law Act 1996, and to advise the Lord Chancellor on issues arising from its implementation. The board will be appointed early in the new year; it will be inter-disciplinary, and its chairman will be independent of the court system. As a consequence, the Children Act Advisory Committee will cease to exist after July 1997.

The new body will be known as the Advisory Board on Family Law. It will report to the Lord Chancellor, and will deal—broadly speaking—with those aspects of family policy and law which are covered by the Family Law Act 1996 and fall within his departmental responsibility. Its precise terms of reference will include a remit to consider the overall impact of Children Act work within the family courts system. To provide continuity with the work of the Children Act Advisory Committee, the membership of the Advisory Board on Family Law will include a family division judge or a Court of Appeal judge with family division experience.

The network of family court business committees and family court forums will continue to deal with operational aspects of Children Act work at local level. They will, as now, be able to refer policy issues to the Lord Chancellor, the Court Service, or the relevant Government Department, as appropriate. At national level, the children's services strategy group, which was recently set up by the Secretary of State for Health, will have a wider role in co-ordinating the interests of Government and other key agencies.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8549]

Mr. Streeter: No appointments have been made in the past year from names which had been first identified by the public appointments unit. The candidates for appointment to the Department's more significant public bodies have been identified following advertising, in line with the code of the commissioner for public appointments.

Magistrates Court Committees

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has received from the Coventry magistrates court committee in respect of the proposed amalgamation of the Coventry, Birmingham and Solihull magistrates court committees. [7848]

Mr. Streeter: As at yesterday morning, the Coventry magistrates courts committee had not submitted a response to the consultation paper issued by my Department on this proposed amalgamation. However, the consultation period does not end until 16 December 1996.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many letters (a) in support of and (b) against the proposed amalgamation of the Coventry, Birmingham and Solihull magistrates court committees he has received; and who they were from. [7846]

Mr. Streeter: By yesterday morning, four letters had been received in support of the proposal and 105 opposing it. Representations have been received from magistrates courts committees, magistrates, court staff, members of Parliament and local justice agencies.

The consultation period closes on 16 December 1996.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what consultations he has had regarding the proposed amalgamation of the Coventry, Birmingham and Solihull magistrates court committees. [7845]

Mr. Streeter: A consultation document proposing the amalgamation of the Birmingham, Coventry and Solihull magistrates courts committees was issued by my Department in October 1996. Copies of the document have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The document was sent to the three magistrates courts committees concerned and the magistrates in those areas, the staff employed by the committees, local authorities, local members of Parliament, criminal justice agencies, Her Majesty's Magistrates' Courts Service Inspectorate and neighbouring magistrates' courts committees. Once the consultation period has closed, all the repsonses received will be given detailed consideration.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Millennium Commission

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what obligations there are on the Millennium Commission to explain its decisions on grant applications. [7709]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There are no specific obligations set out in the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 or in section 26 directions under the Act. However, the Government expect all non-departmental public bodies to abide by the principles of public accountability and all applicants to the commission are informed of the key criteria on which decisions are taken and are told of the basis for decisions once made. The commission reports to Parliament and produces an annual report.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received about Mayflower 2000's bid to the Millennium Commission. [7513]

Mrs. Bottomley: I have received a letter on the subject. It was sent to me in my capacity as chairman of the Millennium Commission and came from the director of the Mayflower 2000 project via the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh). Appended was a list of the supporters of the project.

The Millennium Commission receives a large number of applications for funding. An application for funding for the Mayflower 2000 project was received in round 2 by the Millennium Commission but at that stage was not considered sufficiently "millennial". A second application was received in round 3. Long listing will take place in January 1997 and applicants will be notified of the decisions soon after that date.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will introduce a right of appeal against decisions on grants by the Millennium Commission. [7706]

Mrs. Bottomley: There are no plans to instigate a right of appeal. The Millennium Commission receives an enormous number of applications for funding at each round, all of which compete against each other for what is, after all, a finite sum of money. The commissioners do their utmost to ensure that their decisions are fair and equitable and, in cases where technical expertise is required, they consult with independent experts.

The Millennium Commission has an established complaints procedure for allegations concerning maladministration. This includes a reference to an external independent agency should this prove necessary. The complaints procedure does not cover commissioners' decisions on whether to award a grant. In addition, the commission is subject to normal laws and can be challenged through judicial review. The Government have set up the commission to receive applications and award grants for millennium projects. It is satisfied that adequate safeguards exist against maladministration. In those circumstances, there would seem little point in second guessing the commission.

Millennium Celebrations

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultations she has had with representatives of Christian denominations concerning her role in planning millennium activities. [7692]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The Archbishop of Canterbury's chaplain for public affairs sits on the Millennium co-ordinating group, a forum for various public bodies involved in planning for the millennium. A sub-committee brings together the mainstream Christian Churches, ecumenical groups and representatives of other faiths. The most recent meeting took place on 2 December, and the discussion was lively, far reaching and inclusive.

I shall be attending the next meeting, in January. The Millennium Commission has also held meetings with Church representatives.

V-chip

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she will publish the results of her consultation about the V-chip. [8817]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today issued a report of my Department's consultation on the V-chip. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

I have also announced today a programme for action designed to deal with rising public concern about violence on television. My Department will co-operate with the BBC, the Independent Television Commission and the Broadcasting Standards Commission on a programme to improve the information available to viewers about the content of programmes to be broadcast, and to publicise the policies on scheduling and the watershed. I will give my personal support to his initiative at a seminar for broadcasters to be organised by the BSC early in the new year.

The ITC and the BSC will review their codes of practice and the regulators will continue to ensure that programme makers adhere to them. My Department is also prepared to contribute to the funding of research into the potential of new technologies to provide extra support for viewers if the BSC believes that such research would be useful.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

UNITA

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the number and rank of UNITA military personnel quartered under the supervision of the United Nations verification mission III. [8311]

Dr. Liam Fox: As of 7 December 1996, 69,821 UNITA troops had been registered in 15 quartering areas. A breakdown by rank is not available.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of UNITA weapons have been surrendered to United Nations verification mission III in Angola; and if he will make a statement on the extent to which UNITA has fulfilled its obligations in this respect. [8310]

Dr. Fox: In his report of 2 December 1996 the Secretary-General stated that the United Nations is still awaiting a declaration by UNITA that it has handed over all its weapons. Although the Secretary-General confirmed that considerable progress has recently been achieved on the military front it is essential that UNITA should comply with its obligations to hand over all weapons to the United Nations Angola verification mission without delay.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of UNITA military personnel have been quartered under the supervision of United Nations verification mission III; and if he will make a statement on the extent to which UNITA has fulfilled its obligations in this respect. [8309]

Dr. Fox: In his report of 2 December 1996 the Secretary-General stated that the United Nations is still awaiting a declaration by UNITA that it has assembled all its troops. We have made clear to UNITA our disappointment that some two years after the signing of the Lusaka protocol the quartering process has still not formally been completed.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the number and types of weapons handed over by UNITA of Angola to the United Nations verification mission III. [8308]

Dr. Fox: As of 7 December 1996 the United Nations reported that 30,180 personal weapons and 4,857 crew-served weapons had been handed over to UNAVEM III by quartered UNITA soldiers.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the UN embargo on the supply of weapons to UNITA of Angola. [8307]

Dr. Fox: UN Security Council resolution 1075 of 11 October 1996 expressed deep concern at the failure by states, especially those neighbouring Angola, to implement the provisions of paragraphs 19 to 25 in resolution 864 (1993) vigorously and strictly. As a permanent member of the Security Council the United Kingdom has supported efforts to make this embargo effective.

United Nations Industrial Development Organisation

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will announce his decision on United Kingdom membership of UNIDO. [8704]

Dr. Liam Fox: We have this week informed the UN Secretary General and the Director-General of UNIDO of our intention to withdraw from UNIDO from the end of 1997. We will review this decision towards the end of next year in the light of progress on wider UN institutional reforms.

Zambia

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the recent elections in Zambia; and if he will make a statement. [8191]

Dr. Liam Fox: Although we were disappointed that the recent Zambian elections could not be held on a basis acceptable to all political parties, the results seem to have been accepted by the Zambian people. We now look to the new Zambia Government to demonstrate clearly their determination to pursue good governance and economic reform.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Criminal Cases

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Attorney-General what standing instructions he provides for servants or contractors to the Crown giving advice to the Director of Public Prosecutions in his decisions concerning the advisability or otherwise of prosecuting prima facie criminal offences. [7685]

The Attorney-General: The evidential test applied by the Crown Prosecution Service is that which is set out in the code for crown prosecutors, issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions pursuant to section 10 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985. It is accompanied by an explanatory memorandum. Copies of the current edition of the code and the explanatory memorandum are available in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament. Although statutory responsibility for the code rests with the Director of Public Prosecutions, it is her practice to consult me in relation to any proposed changes.

TRANSPORT

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8545]

Mr. Bowis: One.

Railtrack

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the tax losses made available to Railtrack on privatisation. [8303]

Mr. Watts: A total of £707 million of the British Railways Board's unrelieved trading losses were transferred to Railtrack. In accordance with the provisions of paragraph 15 of schedule 24 to the Finance Act 1994, the transferred losses may be set off only against trading income of railtrack which arose in the period during which it was a public sector railway company.

Bull Bars

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to require the removal of bull bars from existing vehicles. [8104]

Mr. Bowis: No decision has yet been made on this.

Smuggling

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many smugglers have been apprehended by HM Coastguard in each year since 1990. [7806]

Mr. Bowis: Control of smuggling is a matter for HM Customs and Excise who are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

A56

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent assessment he has made of the advantages of trunking the A56. [8193]

Mr. Watts: I met the hon. Gentleman twice last year to discuss this and other issues; on 27 February in London and on 5 June on a visit to Lancashire and Yorkshire.

The position has not changed since my letter to the hon. Gentleman of 25 April 1995, in which I said that I saw no reason for proceeding with trunking the A56—between Colne and the A59 near Skipton—outside of a more general review of the trunk road network.

The Green Paper, "Transport: the Way Forward" published in April 1996 described our response to local authority proposals on the trunk road network, at paragraph 14.84.

Railway and Underground Accidents (Children)

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by region, railway and underground railway accidents involving children under the age of 17 years, for each year between 1990 and 1996 providing a breakdown by age, nature of injury; and whether or not the accident resulted in a fatality. [7971]

Mr. Watts: Accidents to trespassers and suicides aged under 17 in Great Britain 1990–1995–1996.

Year	Fatal	Major	Minor	Total
1990	15	22	4	41
1991	2	7	1	10
1991–92	8	20	4	32
1992–93	7	15	3	25
1993–94	10	11	7	28
1994–95	9	10	6	25
1995–96	9	10	5	24
Total	60	95	30	185

Figures for 1991 are for the period 1 January 1991 to 31 March 1991 only.

The remaining information is not available in the form requested and could be provided in that format only at disproportionate cost.

Casualties to trespassers and suicides in 1995–96, analysed by operator and showing the number of children aged under 16, are shown in appendix 8A of "Railway Safety Her Majesty's Chief Inspecting Officer of railways annual report on the safety record of the railways in Great Britain during 1995–96". Copies of this report are in the Library of the House.

Road Signs

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the percentage of the Highways Agency budget devoted to road signing projects in each of the last five years. [8422]

Mr. Watts: New, enhanced, alternative or replacement signs are provided from within various types of works contract. These contracts can be major national projects, large and small regional improvements, local safety schemes and maintenance works. Each year the agency completes many hundred such contracts and the information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement on the condition of the road signs for which his Department has responsibility in the county of Cheshire; [8442]

(2) if he will list the amount spent on road signings in the county of Cheshire by the Highways Agency in each of the last five years; and if he will list the percentage of the budget spent in Cheshire devoted to road signing in the same period. [8443]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 10 December 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent questions about the condition of the road signs in Cheshire, and the amount of money the Agency has spent on road signing in Cheshire.

The signs on the trunk road and motorway network in Cheshire are generally in good condition. A small proportion of signs have been identified as being in need of replacement and this work will be included in maintenance programmes when funds become available.

Expenditure on road signs within Cheshire under the maintenance programme within the last five years is as follows:

Year	Expenditure £ million	Percentage of maintenance allocation
1993–94	0.268	2.5
1994–95	0.183	1.5
1995–96	0.186	2.1
1996–97	0.180	2.4

The full information requested is not readily available as separate records are not kept of all signing work included as part of new construction or maintenance schemes.

Departmental Management Objectives

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the annual management objectives for each of his Department's divisions. [8327]

Sir George Young: The Department's principal objectives were set out in the foreword to the "Transport Report 1996" [Cm 3206]. Each agency publishes an annual business plan which includes its key targets. Copies of all these documents are in the Library of the House.

The Department's aims and main objectives are currently under review and updated aims and objectives will be published in the 1997 Transport report and departmental plan.

Noise Barriers

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 417, if highway authorities are empowered to fund the construction of noise barriers on existing motorways and trunk roads built (a) before and (b) after 17 October 1969. [8265]

Mr Watts [holding answer 9 December 1996]: Yes. Section 282 of the Highways Act 1980 empowers highway authorities to fund noise barriers on motorways and trunk roads built before and after 17 October 1969. The use of this power is discretionary, and there is no obligation on highway authorities to fund the construction of noise barriers.

Shipping

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of his Department's budget was allocated to shipping matters in (a) 1979 and (b) 1996. [7837]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 9 December 1996]: Shipping matters were the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Industry in 1979. Net expenditure in 1996–97 on these services, including the Marine Safety Agency, the Coastguard Agency and their associated administrative costs, forms 2 per cent. of the Department of Transport's overall expenditure control total.

M27

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the total expenditure in design, legal costs, land acquisition and other preparatory work for the M27, junctions 4 to 11, widening scheme. [8033]

Mr. Watts: A preliminary widening study of M27, junctions 4 to 12, was undertaken by consultants between 1989 and 1991 at a cost of £291,000. No other costs were incurred on the scheme until its recent withdrawal from the programme.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Computerised Cattle Registration

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the introduction in Great Britain of a central computerised system to record cattle movements. [8818]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Government commissioned a feasibility study on establishing a computerised cattle traceability system in Great Britain in July 1996. The study has been completed, and its findings considered. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales and I are putting forward proposals for implementation of the system.

The Government consider that improved cattle traceability would have considerable benefit in underpinning consumer confidence in the beef market. All cattle born or imported to Great Britain since 1 July 1996 have had to have a cattle passport. This records details of the animal's identity and its movements. Holding the details of movements on a computer database would improve tracing of animals still further. There are already similar databases in Northern Ireland and in some other European countries.

Under our proposals, details of the cattle movements would be entered on to the computer database by a new private sector organisation, known as the "British cattle movement service". Farmers and others in the livestock industry would send in details of cattle movements using a simple form and a "freepost" system. Businesses reporting large volumes of movements, such as livestock markets and abattoirs, would be able to use electronic data transfer, instead of a form. Access to the movement information on the database would be permitted, probably on payment of a charge.

The livestock industry will be the main beneficiary of the computerised cattle traceability system, which will be essential to help re-establish confidence in beef and beef products at home and abroad. Thus, the Government are proposing that the running costs of the system should be borne by the industry. Including the costs of postage, these are likely to be some £20 million to £25 million a year. The Government propose to meet the start-up costs of the system, estimated at some £5 million.

I recognise that this project is of great significance to the livestock industry. In order for the computerised system to be effective, it will be essential to have the industry's support. Thus during implementation of the system, the Government will continue the close liaison they have had with the industry during and since the feasibility study commissioned in July. We look forward to a constructive dialogue with the industry on the proposals in our consultation document, a copy of which has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The deadline for responses is 31 January 1997.

Mr. D. P. McLaughlan

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to reply to the letter of 13 June from the hon. Member for Aylesbury enclosing correspondence from Mr. D. P. McLaughlan of Princes Risborough. [7038]

Mrs. Browning: I replied to the letter of 13 June from the hon. Member for Aylesbury, enclosing correspondence from Mr. D. P. McLaughlan of Princes Risborough, on 9 December 1996.

BSE

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated direct cost to United Kingdom public funds in the 1996–97 financial year of dealing with the BSE crisis; and what is the estimated provision for 1997–98, taking account of claw back on European Community assistance. [7358]

Mr. Boswell: I will write to the hon. Member with this information shortly.

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what promotional and public information campaigns his Department is (a) currently running and (b) planning to run during the next six months; and for each campaign (i) how much it will cost, (1) in total and (2) to his Department, (ii) what agencies or bodies are undertaking the work and (iii) what is its planned duration. [7408]

Mr. Boswell: MAFF's planned public information campaign for the financial year 1996–97 and the projected costs are as follows:

Food Safety and Healthy Eating	1,377,000
Animal Health and Welfare (excluding 'BSE')	526,000
Environmentally Sensitive Areas	131,000
Countryside Stewardship	115,000
'Balance in the Countryside'	90,000
Prevention of Agricultural Pollution	139,000
Research Policy Co-ordination	35,000
CAP and other Scheme Literature	680,000
International Relations and Export Promotion	350,000
Market Task Force	30,000
Speciality Food Producers	58,000
Plant Health and Horticulture	199,000
Flood and Coastal Defence	28,000
Alternative Crops	48,000
Personal Imports	150,000
Rabies	135,000
General Environmental Information	408,000
Agricultural Events	168,000

The work is undertaken by specialist contractors from the private sector who are commissioned and project managed by the Department's information division.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much his Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much he estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7540]

Mr. Boswell: Expenditure on public information campaigns by the Department in each of the last five financial years, and estimates for the current and next financial years are as follows:

1991–92: £4,094,000

1992–93: £4,217,000

1993–94: £4,312,000

1994–95: £4,800,000

1995–96: £4,738,000

1996–97: £4,667,000

1997–98[1]: £4,416,000

[1] Estimates.

Mammalian Meat and Bonemeal (Transport)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received concerning potential cross-contamination from the transport of mammalian meat and bonemeal in vehicles that are also used to transport grain; and if he will make a statement. [7946]

Mrs. Browning: We have received no such representations. Regulation 14 of the Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy Order 1996 requires any vehicle used to transport mammalian meat and bonemeal, or material containing mammalian meat and bonemeal, to be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected as soon as possible after the transport ceases and in any event before the vehicle is used for any other purpose.

Sheep Dips (Pollution)

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the cases of pollution resulting from the misuse of synthetic pyrethroid sheep dips which have been notified to (a) his Department and (b) the Environment Agency within the past 12 months. [7802]

Mrs. Browning: There is no requirement to notify my Department of pollution incidents from sheep dips. Statistics on water pollution are published annually by the Environment Agency. The latest report, "Water Pollution Incidents in England and Wales 1995", shows that there were very few incidents of pollution from sheep dip in that year. These figures do not distinguish between pollution from synthetic pyrethroids or other sheep dips. Figures for 1996 are not yet available.

Organophosphate Poisoning

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many notified cases of organophosphate poisoning have been reported to his Department; and if he will make a statement. [7912]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reports of the appraisal panel for human suspected adverse reactions to veterinary medicines which are available in the Library of the House. Any cases of poisoning by agricultural pesticides other than veterinary medicines are reported to the pesticides incidents appraisal panel of the Health and Safety Executive.

Cattle Cull

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress with proposals for the future selective cull. [7914]

Mr. Baldry: The Government announced on 19 September that they would not proceed for the present with the selective cull of cattle in relation to BSE.

The decision was taken in the light of interim research findings, reported in July, in which a higher proportion of the offspring of BSE cases themselves developed BSE than a similar group of cattle which were not the offspring of BSE cases. Further analysis of that study is being undertaken. Also, the analysis published by Professor Roy Anderson and his team at Oxford university in August indicated that the epidemic will virtually die out around 2001 irrespective of any further measures, that the targeting in the original cull proposal could be improved, and that there might be other possible approaches.

This does not mean that the Government have abandoned the selective cull. The cull options will be reconsidered after further consideration of the latest scientific developments, and in the light of progress with relaxing export restrictions in relation to herds which can be certified to have had no history of BSE.

BSE (Maternal Transmission)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the scientific evidence concerning maternal transmission of BSE; and if he will make a statement. [7979]

Mrs. Browning: The Minister received advice from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee—SEAC—on the interim results of a comparative trial of cattle on 29 July. This indicated that there was evidence of maternal transmission. However, alternative scientific views were put forward subsequently. The Minister has therefore asked SEAC to reconsider this when the final results of the trial are available in the new year.

Vegetarian Cheese

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received on the labelling of vegetarian cheese. [7843]

Mrs. Browning: The only representations that have been received on the labelling of vegetarian cheese in the last year have concerned that produced using genetic modification. As many of the letters received on genetic modification over this period have covered a wide range of issues it is not possible to give precise figures easily on the number that have mentioned the labelling of vegetarian cheese but it is estimated to be fewer than 25.

Departmental Expenditure

Sir Jerry Wiggin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each of the agri-environmental schemes for which his Department is responsible, (i) actual expenditure in 1992–93, 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96, (ii) provision and estimated outturn of expenditure in 1996–97 and (iii) planned expenditure in 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, distinguishing in each case between (a) payments to farmers, (b) running costs and (c) monitoring costs. [8007]

Mr. Boswell: Details are contained in the following tables. It is not possible at this stage to make forward projections of running or monitoring costs.

French Fishermen

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under what statutory provision the United Kingdom is permitted to suspend concessions for French fishermen fishing in United Kingdom waters. [7790]

Mr. Baldry: The rights of access of French fishing vessels to fish in United Kingdom waters are contained in Council regulation (EEC) No. 3760/92. Article 6 and annex 1 of this regulation set out particular access rights in the coastal waters of the United Kingdom between six and 12 miles. These access rights are given statutory effect in the Fishing Boat (European Economic Community) Designation Order 1983, as amended. They could not be unilaterally suspended without the United Kingdom being in breach of its international obligations.

Genetically-engineered Tomatoes

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received on the labelling of genetically-engineered tomatoes. [7844]

Mrs. Browning: As many of the letters received on genetic modification over the last year have covered a wide range of issues it is not possible to give precise figures easily on the number that have mentioned the labelling of genetically modified tomatoes but it is estimated to be fewer than 25.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions she has had with the Treasury in respect of the proposed changes to early retirement provisions for teachers. [7105]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend discusses all issues that have a significant impact on public spending with the Treasury.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many national vocational qualifications have been awarded to individuals assessed at an overseas award centre. [6934]

Mr. Paice: Data are not available on the number of national vocational qualifications awarded to individuals assessed at an overseas award centre.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Eduction and Employment how many national vocational qualifications awarded by the end of December 1995 were gained by individuals on Government training schemes. [6938]

Mr. Paice [holding answer 28 November 1996]: The information requested is not available. According to information from the youth training and training for work follow-up surveys, 41 per cent. of YT and 42 per cent. of TfW leavers respectively gained a full qualification in England and Wales in 1995 and a further 9 per cent. of YT and 7 per cent. of TfW leavers gained a part-qualification. Many of these will have been NVQs; however, in 1995, many predecessor qualifications were still in use.

International Labour Organisation

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the effective annual contribution of the United Kingdom to the International Labour Organisation; what assessment she has made of the benefits of the United Kingdom from membership of that organisation; and what periodic reviews of the United Kingdom's membership are conducted. [7976]

Mr. Paice: Some £9,006,587, or 5.24 per cent., of the ILO's budget, in 1996. The Government review Britain's membership of all UN agencies, including the ILO, on a regular basis.

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many complaints have been made by the International Labour Organisation against (a) United Kingdom trades union and employment legislation and (b) British companies in the last 10 years. [7975]

Mr. Paice: In the last 10 years, about 35 representations have been made to the ILO on UK trade union and employment legislation, including four on its implementation by British companies and industries. All these representations were made by the TUC. Only five of the issues concerned have been debated at the ILO conference. There have been no representations by employer organisations.

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what response she has made to the charges made by the International Labour Organisation about the alleged unfairness of United Kingdom trade union legislation; what assessment she has made of the procedures in the International Labour Organisation for examining allegations from trade unions about British employers; and what steps are taken by the United Kingdom Government to ensure that proper representations are made in response. [7977]

Mr. Paice: The Government respond fully to all comments made by the ILO supervisory bodies on their legislation through the normal reporting machinery. They have explained why they believe nothing in British law and practice is incompatible with our obligations under ratified ILO conventions. The UK has been at the forefront of moves to streamline and modernise the ILO's supervisory machinery.

Personal Services Industry

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many notified vacancies offering employment as models have been displayed by the Employment Service on a monthly average, in the last year for which figures are available; and if she will break down the information by region; [7988]

(2) how many notified vacancies offering employment in sauna baths, massage parlours, escort and kissogram agencies have been displayed by the Employment Service, on a monthly average, in the last year for which figures are available; and if she will break down the information by region; [7989]

(3) how many notified vacancies offering employment in the personal services industry have been refused or withdrawn by the Employment Service due to concerns of taste or decency expressed by staff or clients; [7990]

(4) how many jobseeker's directives have been issued to clients who have refused notified vacancies in the personal services industry; [7991]

(5) how many clients have had their jobseeker's allowance refused or reduced for refusing to take up a notified vacancy in the personal services industry. [7992]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Ian McCartney, dated 10 December 1996:

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to write to you direct about your questions of 4 December concerning vacancies in the personal services industry, and the numbers of clients who have received jobseeker's directions, or had their Jobseekers Allowance refused or reduced, for refusing such vacancies. This falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

You asked for information about notified vacancies offering employment as models and also those offering employment in sauna baths, massage parlours, escort and kissogram agencies. I am afraid such information is not available.

It might be helpful if I explained that the Employment Service keeps records of vacancies notified based on the Standard Occupational Classification (SOC) and Standard Industrial Classification (SIC). These form the framework for the collection and analysis of data used by the Office for National Statistics and also meet standards required by the EC Regulation.

SOC uses a structured approach to occupational classification. Occupations are identified and aggregated with reference to the similarity of qualifications, training, skills and experience commonly associated with the competent performance of constituent tasks. Variations in the tasks performed occur between one place of employment and another and consequently not all definitions can be expected to coincide exactly with specific jobs in a particular establishment or in a given locality. SIC was first introduced into the United Kingdom in 1948 for use in classifying business establishments and other statistical units by the type of economic activity in which they are engaged. The classification provides a framework for the collection, tabulation, presentation and analysis of data about economic activities. Its use promotes uniformity of data collected by various government departments and agencies. In addition it can be used for administrative purposes and by many non-government bodies as a convenient way of classifying industrial activities into a common structure.

The structure of SOC and SIC mean, I am afraid, that it is not possible to break down information in a way which would enable the particular information you are interested in to be separately identified.

On the question of notified vacancies in the personal services sector which have been withdrawn, due to concerns expressed relating to taste and decency, information of this nature is not collected. However, all Jobcentres have guidance which stipulates that they must not accept vacancies which: are illegal; would result in a breach of the law; might put jobseekers at risk. It also states that if they are notified of vacancies which require models, offer employment in sauna baths, massage parlours, escort and kissogram agencies, or other personal/telephone services special regard should be paid to the reputation of the employer. Details are sought of the establishment and conditions of training and employment, whether the hours of work or the location or interview arrangements give cause for concern, and whether there is an indication of a lack of professional standards. Jobcentres are advised that where any concerns arise about the above issues that such vacancies should be treated with caution and in any cases of doubt they should refuse to handle the vacancies. Following questions asked on 4 November by the Honourable Member for Sheffield Hillsborough about a female constituent being referred to a vacancy for an administrative assistant with a male escort agency, work is in progress to further strengthen this guidance.

The information you requested concerning the number of jobseeker's directions issued to clients who have refused notified vacancies in the personal services industry, and the number of clients who have had their Jobseeker's Allowance refused or reduced for refusing to take up such vacancies, is not available and could only be obtained at a disproportionate cost.

Your questions on the policy in respect of the continuing payment of Jobseeker's Allowance to people who have refused to take a job in the personal services industry, and your proposed amendment to the regulations, will be answered direct by the Minister of State.

I hope this is helpful in clarifying the position.

Schools (Sheffield)

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the schools for which Sheffield local education authority applied for supplementary credit approval for each of the last three years; and if she will make a statement. [8100]

Mrs. Gillan: There follows a list of the schools for which Sheffield local education authority has applied for supplementary credit approvals in the three financial years 1994–95, 1995–96 and 1996–97:

Financial year 1994–95

Millan Centre (Youth Club)
Silverdale Secondary
Waltheof Secondary

Financial year 1996–97

Birley Spa Primary (Schools Renewal Challenge Fund)
Waltheof School Secondary (Schools Renewal Challenge Fund)

During this period, the Government have provided capital support to Sheffield local education authority through annual capital guidelines of £10.259 million and supplementary credit approvals of £8.968 million.

Local Education Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions she has had with local authorities representatives concerning local education authorities' responsibilities for deciding capital expenditure; and if she will make a statement. [8101]

Mrs. Gillan: We discuss local education authorities spending needs for capital work with the local authority associations at official level at the service working group on education and at ministerial level at the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance.

It is for individual local education authorities to decide how to use the capital resources available to them.

Pupil Exclusions

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list, by region, the number of children excluded from school in each year for which figures are available. [8068]

Mr. Forth: Figures on permanent exclusions by region are available for the first time for the school year 1994–95. They are as follows:

	Number
North	654
Yorkshire and Humberside	953
North West	1,512
East Midlands	855
West Midlands	1,287
East Anglia	336
Greater London	2,064
Other South East	2,132
South West	876
Total	10,669

The Department will be collecting comprehensive figures for permanent exclusions in the school year 1995–96 as part of the annual schools census in January. These figures will be available later in 1997.

Schools Renewal Challenge Fund

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the local authorities which have applied for funding under the schools renewal challenge fund. [8099]

Mrs. Gillan: One hundred local education authorities have submitted bids for funding from the schools renewal challenge fund. The following list sets out these authorities alphabetically.

Student Union Membership

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the cost to HM Government of carrying out the provisions of the Education Act 1994 concerning students opting out of membership of student unions. [7396]

Mr. Forth: There have been no direct costs to Government from the implementation of the provisions of the Education Act 1994. It is the responsibility of the governing body of a higher or further education institution to take such steps as are reasonably practicable to secure that the requirement concerning the right of a student not to be a union member is observed by, or in relation to, a students' union.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will estimate the cost to student unions of implementing the provisions of the Education Act 1994 concerning students opting out of membership. [7397]

Mr. Forth: Such an estimate cannot be provided. Information on student unions' costs is not collected centrally.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students have opted out of membership of student unions under the terms of the Education Act 1994 in each student union. [7398]

Mr. Forth: This information is not available as it is not collected centrally.

Small Firms Initiative

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total Government expenditure on the small firms initiative in each year of the programme's operation; and if she will make a statement on the programme. [8220]

Mr. Paice: Total expenditure on skills for small businesses in 1995–96 was £6.178 million. Expenditure in 1996–97 currently stands at £5.924 million. Skills for small businesses was established as a three-year initiative. Following a comprehensive Government review, this initiative will be absorbed into the local competitiveness budget from April 1997. This will provide wide-ranging advice and support to local firms by training and enterprise councils and business links.

Job Training

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total Government expenditure in 1995–96 prices on (a) the youth training scheme, (b) youth training, including youth credits, modern apprenticeships and accelerated modern apprenticeships, (c) the direct training service, (d) local initiative funds and (e) the former job training scheme for each year of their operation up to the latest year for which data are available. [8221]

Mr. Paice: The information requested is given in the following tables:

Youth training scheme

Year[1]	Expenditure (£ million)	Expenditure at 1995–96 prices (£ million)

Careers Libraries

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total Government expenditure on careers libraries, in each year since their establishment; and if she will make a statement on the declared aims of the careers libraries. [8222]

Mr. Paice: The total annual Government expenditure on the careers library initiative, excluding value added tax, since its implementation is as follows:

1992–93: £6.283 million

1993–94: £5.984 million

1994–95: £1.488 million

1995–96: £1.345 million (provisional)

1996–97: £1.515 million (planned)

The aim of the careers library initiative is to equip secondary schools and colleges with up-to-date careers libraries and computerised information.

Employment Schemes (Geographical Mobility)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total Government expenditure on incorporating geographical mobility into (a) the employment transfer scheme, (b) the free forwards fares scheme and (c) the job search scheme in each year of their operation. [8224]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Frank Field, dated 10 December 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning the total government expenditure on incorporating geographical mobility into the employment transfer scheme, the free forwards fares scheme and the job search scheme in each year of their operation. This falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The Employment Transfer Scheme (ETS), Free Forward Fares Scheme (FFFS) and Job Search Scheme (JSS) were the three geographical mobility schemes, operated by the Manpower Services Commission and were replaced in 1986 by the Travel to Interview Scheme (TIS).

We have no records of expenditure prior to the 1987–88 financial year when the Employment Service came into being. Expenditure on TIS, which became the responsibility of the Employment Service in that year, since then has been:

Year	£ million
1987–88	0.5
1988–89	1.0
1989–90	0.7
1990–91	0.6
1991–92	0.9
1992–93	1.5
1993–94	1.7
1994–95	1.8
1995–96	1.7

I hope this is helpful.

Careers Officer Training

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total Government expenditure on the careers officer training grants programme, administered by the Department of Employment, in each year of the programme's operation; and if she will make a statement on the programme. [8225]

Mr. Paice: The careers officer training grants programme administered by the Department of Employment started in 1981. Figures for expenditure on the programme are not available before 1989–90. However, expenditure in subsequent years is as follows:

1989–90: £550,000

1990–91: £560,000

1991–92: £580,000

1992–93: £645,000

1993–94: £600,000

1994–95: £695,000

1995–96: £1.5 million

The Department for Education and Employment has continued to fund expenditure on this programme.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8542]

Mr. Robin Squire: Before 1 April 1996, no central record was maintained of the sources of names of appointees. Since that date, two appointees have been identified by the public appointments unit.

Education Standards

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the standards of education achieved (a) in Britain and (b) in other countries for which she holds comparable figures. [8340]

Mr. Robin Squire: The UK has more detailed and comprehensive systems to measure standards achieved by pupils than any other country. These show that standards in the UK have risen significantly over recent years, and continue to do so. For example, one in three young people now proceeds to higher education, and the vast majority of 16-year-olds continue in full-time education or training: whereas 15 years ago, the figures were respectively one in eight, and one half.

Cross-national comparisons of educational standards are difficult, given the problems of definition and measurement. Some relevant data are given in the annual OECD publication, "Education at a Glance". This shows the UK to be in the middle of the range of OECD countries on most of the 45 indicators.

Earlier this year, the Government's skills audit examined the performance of four comparator countries: France, Germany, Singapore and the USA. The study highlighted that the UK needs to do more to address literacy, numeracy and other key skills, and to raise achievement at levels 2 and 3; and the Government are already taking appropriate action.

A recent report of the third international mathematics and science study compares the performance of 13-year-olds in England in science—where we do well—and mathematics—where we need to improve—with that of pupils in other countries. Further reports on the performance of nine-year-olds are to be produced later in 1997.

All these reports can be found in the Library.

Special Educational Needs Tribunal

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the 1995–96 annual report of the president of the special educational needs tribunal will be published; and if she will make a statement. [8701]

Mrs. Gillan: The report has been published today, and copies have been placed in the Library.

I very much welcome the report. It demonstrates clearly that the special educational needs tribunal has continued, and improved on, its record in meeting the targets it was set for dealing with appeals.

The tribunal provides a unique and valuable mechanism for considering appeals and the needs of children are at the heart of its consideration. It has gained a deserved reputation for impartiality, informality and, above all, fairness. This was the basis on which it was established and it is a tribute to the professionalism of the tribunal's members and staff that they have managed to achieve this.

I applaud the hard work of the tribunal president, members and staff. A great deal has been achieved in the last year. I am confident that the tribunal will continue to build on its excellent record.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress CEWTEC, Hampshire TEC, METROTEC, Wight Training and Enterprise, Wiltshire TEC, ELTEC, training and enterprise councils and Sussex Enterprise are making in meeting the criteria for the award of a licence. [8786]

Mr. Paice: I am pleased to announce the award of a licence to CEWTEC, Hampshire TEC, METROTEC, Wight Training and Enterprise, Wiltshire TEC, and Sussex Enterprise. When ELTEC has an operational business link, which must be in place before the end of March 1997, it will have met all of the criteria and will be awarded a licence.

Employment Service Pens

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much the Employment Service agency has spent on pens carrying the slogan, "Job Centre—The Right People For The Job"; which company produced the pens; how many were produced; how they have been distributed; and what other promotional items have been produced by the agency during this period. [8042]

Mr. Forth [holding answer 9 December 1996]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 10 December 1996:

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your question concerning the production of and expenditure on promotional items by the Employment Service (ES). This falls within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Agency.

There are no centrally produced or widely available promotional items. Each ES region, together with Wales and Scotland, has a devolved budget for local marketing activities, including promotional items. I have consulted my regional marketing managers to be able to reply to your questions.

On the issue of the pens carrying the slogan 'Jobcentre—The right people for the job', this was produced for use in the Ayrshire North district. Castle Sales supplied 150 pens at a cost of £555. These were distributed to employers attending an event to launch an Employer's Charter in October 1996. This Charter was the culmination of work undertaken by my people in Ayrshire North to encourage employers to use the seven local Jobcentres to meet their recruitment needs.

Promotional items are used sparingly and represent a small proportion of the overall budgets for marketing and publicity purposes. Because responsibilities and budgets are devolved to local managers I am afraid it is not possible for me to identify any other offices who may also have commissioned a promotional pen similar to the Ayrshire North example. The total amount of the devolved marketing budget for 1995/96 is £2.9m. This covers all aspects of marketing Employment Service products and services to both employers and jobseekers at local level.

On the issue of other promotional items, my regional marketing managers produce a range of promotional items to meet specific targeted marketing needs. These include pens, coasters, rulers, year planners, mousemats and carrier bags and are used to inform employers and jobseekers of the benefits of using Jobcentres and to encourage participation in Employment Service programmes. They are used at employer marketing events such as conferences and exhibitions in the main.

I hope this is helpful.

Private Landlords (Housing Benefit)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual amount of social security paid to private landlords via housing benefit; and what is the estimated amount of income tax (a) payable on that benefit, (b) improperly withheld and (c) actually paid. [7201]

Mr. Jack: Precise figures are not available but it is estimated that, in 1995–96, some £1.9 billion of housing benefit was paid directly to private landlords—that is, individuals and companies–excluding housing associations. Information on the effect on income tax liabilities of this part of the income of private landlords is not available.

"Financial Statement and Budget Report"

Mr. Timms: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide the information set out in table 5.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" for projects where contracts have been signed. [7224]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 2 December 1996]: The information required is as follows:

Single Currency Stability Pact

Sir George Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons his letter sent to hon. Members relating to the proposed single currency stability pact, the contents of which were made public on 22 November, was posted to the hon. Member for Reigate on Monday 25 November, by second class post. [7025]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 2 December 1996]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply of 4 December at column 652.

British Artists (Germany)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with German Treasury Ministers about the tax treatment of British artists appearing in Germany. [7672]

Mr. Jack: Discussions have not been held on the specific issue of UK resident artists appearing in Germany. Germany imposes tax at a rate of 25 per cent. from the gross payments made to non-resident entertainers. However, Germany has confirmed that artists performing in Germany may apply for an income tax assessment by submitting a tax return at the end of the tax year to take into account the actual expenses they have incurred.

Taxation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the value in constant 1996 prices of an increase of one penny in 1995–96 income tax for each of the tax rates and in total from (a) each of the 22 unitary authorities in Wales, (b) Wales and (c) the United Kingdom in (i) 1996–97 and (ii) 1997–98 indicating in each case the percentage of additional tax raised. [7458]

Mr. Jack: It is not possible to provide a reliable breakdown below United Kingdom level for 1995–96. The latest available information is for 1994–95. The full year yield from a 1p increase in each of the tax rates under the 1994–95 tax regime and at 1994–95 income levels is given in the table. The overall yield from increasing all of the tax rates by 1p represents about 4 per cent. of the total income tax liabilities of individuals in that year.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost incurred by each Government Department in answering parliamentary questions in the last parliamentary session. [7521]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information is given in the table for the Session 1995–96:

Department of Health	424,942
Home Office	324,794
Department of Transport	307,020
Department of the Environment	296,592
Department of Trade and Industry	286,839
Ministry of Defence	271,580
Welsh Office	260,658
Department for Education and Employment	260,496
Scottish Office	253,189
Department of Social Security	248,711
Foreign and Commonwealth Office	244,544
Cabinet Office[1]	222,952
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	195,972
Treasury	195,040
Northern Ireland Office	171,654

[1] Includes questions answered by the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The estimated costs are based upon average costs calculated by the Treasury for April 1996 as £107 for answering a written parliamentary question and £249 for an oral parliamentary question. Information on the number of questions answered by each Government Department has been obtained from the parliamentary online information system database. Equivalent information for the House of Lords is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what change there has been in public sector capital investment since the private finance initiative was introduced. [7725]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 5 December 1996]: Public sector capital expenditure and capital expenditure under the private finance initiative are both shown in table 5.4, on page 99, of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Tourism (Wales)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the income derived from taxation on tourism services in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [7917]

Mr. Jack: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Petrol and Diesel

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average weekly expenditure in 1995–96 on (a) petrol and (b) diesel for households owning a car where the household composition was that of one man and one woman with two children, by each decile group. [7825]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr Alan Milburn, dated 10 December 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on the average weekly household expenditure in 1995–96 on petrol and diesel for a particular housenold composition.

Estimates from the Family Expenditure Survey (FES) for expenditure on petrol by this type of household with at least one car or van are shown in the attached table. Average spending on diesel was estimated to have been £1.80 per week in 1995–96; the sample is not large enough to provide reliable estimates by income decile group. The figures are subject to sampling variations and have been rounded to the nearest 10 pence.

Self-assessment

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis he has calculated the latest figure for savings estimated to the Inland Revenue from the introduction of self-assessment. [8273]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 9 December 1996]: The estimated savings from the introduction of self-assessment are calculated on the basis set out in the Green Book, and are part of a cost-benefit analysis.

Computers

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated total cost (a) to business, (b) to businesses with under 100 employees and (c) to businesses with under 10 employees of reprogramming computer software to accommodate new P60 and P14 forms. [5441]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 25 November 1996]: Costs arise only where employers choose to use substitute forms in place of the official versions which are supplied free of charge by the Inland Revenue. Although we do not keep the information in the form requested we feel that, overall, costs are negligible.

Non-Hodgkin's Lymphoma

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) cases of and (b) deaths from malignant non-Hodgkin's lymphoma have been recorded in England in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [6224]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 27 November 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 10 December 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) to your recent question on how many cases of, and deaths from the malignant non-Hodgkin's lymphoma have been recorded in each of the last five years.

The figures for England are given in the attached table.

National data on the incidence of cancer are not yet available for more recent years. The process of cancer registration is complex and takes time; the fastest of the regional registries in England and Wales takes about 2 years to achieve 90% completeness. National figures cannot be produced until data for the last of the regional registries have been received. Over the past five years a great deal of work has been done to try to improve timeliness without sacrificing quality and completeness. Several registries have introduced new computer systems, and ONS has redeveloped its processing. Once the new systems are up and running figures will be produced more quickly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Expenditure Allocations

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the allocation to individual programmes in Northern Ireland of the public expenditure totals announced on 26 November. [8648]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: In his Budget Statement on 26 November, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced total public expenditure planning figures for the Northern Ireland programme. I have now decided on the allocations to individual programmes as shown in the following table. Copies of a more detailed statement have been placed in the Library. These allocations reflect my assessment of how best to distribute the Northern Ireland public expenditure totals in response to local needs and circumstances.

NI Block (excluding Social Security Benefits)	5,553	5,500	5,500
Social Security Benefits	2,494	2,590	2,700
NI Block	8,046	8,090	8,190
National Agriculture and Fisheries Support	175	170	170
NI Programme	8,222	8,260	8,360

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest £1 million in 1997–98 and to the nearest £10 million in 1998–99 and 1999–2000.

2. The figures for 1997–98 will form the basis for preparation by Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office of Main Estimates for the coming year. These will be presented to Parliament in due course.

3. The Education and Block totals are reduced to reflect the NI share of proceeds from the proposed sale of student loans debt. This reduction does not affect Block spending power.

4. Allocations from the EU Peace and Reconciliation Programme are included in the figures above.

Quangos

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those persons sitting on (a) two, (b) three, (c) four, (d) five and (e) six or more quangos; what salary or allowances each is paid; and by what means each was appointed. [5836]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested about individuals holding two or more appointments on Northern Ireland public bodies has been placed in the Library of the House. These appointments are made by Departments with the approval of the relevant Minister. To identify the remuneration paid to each person listed would incur disproportionate costs; however, remuneration levels are given in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Appointments 1995", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Public Bodies

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the people he has appointed to non-departmental public bodies since 30 April, together with the bodies concerned. [5837]

Sir John Wheeler: As the information requested is lengthy, it has been placed in the Library.

President Robinson (Visits)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what advice he has given to President Mary Robinson about visits to Northern Ireland in 1996; through which channels; and if he will make a statement. [7186]

Sir John Wheeler: The Secretary of State has not offered any advice to President Robinson about visits to Northern Ireland this year.

Judicial Review

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the Chief Constable has taken to explain and communicate to all members of the RUC their responsibilities and the implications arising from the judgment in the matter of the application for judicial review by John William Alexander Stewart. [6093]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 4 December 1996]: Both applications for judicial review in this case were dismissed on 12 January 1995.

Members of the RUC are expected to be aware of instructions and regulations dealing with the standards of conduct required of them; no changes in these instructions and regulations were required by the terms of the judgment.

Seat Belts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) drivers and (b) passengers have been prosecuted for not wearing seat belts in the (i) front seats and (ii) back seats of vehicles in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8208]

Sir John Wheeler: The figures refer to persons proceeded against for either a primary or secondary offence at high and low courts. It is not possible to distinguish between drivers and passengers.

(i) Failing to wear front seat belt

1991: 1,379

1992: 1,409

1993: 1,306

1994: 1,131

1991: 0

1992: 8

1993: 39

1994: 26

1995: 38

Agri-environmental Schemes

Sir Jerry Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each of the agri-environmental schemes for which his Department is responsible, (i) actual expenditure in 1992–93, 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96, (ii) provision and estimated outturn of expenditure in 1996–97 and (iii) planned expenditure in 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, distinguishing in each case between (a) payments to farmers, (b) running costs and (c) monitoring costs. [8010]

Mr. Ancram: The details are contained in the following tables. It is not possible at this stage to make forward projections of running or monitoring costs.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8540]

Sir John Wheeler: None of the individuals appointed to public bodies in Northern Ireland during 1996 were persons identified by the public appointments unit.

Low Impact Development

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment his Department has made of the capacity of the planning system to accommodate low impact development; and if he will make a statement. [3357]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Planning Service under its chief executive, Mr. T. W. Stewart. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from T. W. Stewart to Mr. Martyn Jones, dated 10 December 1996:

As you know, Mr. Moss recently asked me to write to you in reply to a number of Questions which you had raised in the House. My letters of 13 November 1996 addressed Questions 1650, 1651, 1652, 1653, 1654 and 1655, however, the letter sent in reply to PQ 1659 was a copy of the letter sent in reply to PQ 1651. I apologise for the oversight and for any confusion this might have caused.

Your Question asked about an assessment of the capacity of the planning system to accommodate low impact development.

The Planning Service has made no such assessment. We will, however, monitor the outcome of any assessment undertaken in the rest of the United Kingdom, and assess what relevance, if any, it may have for Northern Ireland.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Offenders

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the peak age of offending for males and females in (a) London and (b) England and Wales in (i) 1979, (ii) 1990 and (iii) the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [7701]

Mr. Maclean: Table A gives information for England and Wales on the peak age of known offending, that is, offenders found guilty or cautioned for indictable offences per 100,000 in the general population in the age group.

Table B gives the readily available information for the Metropolitan police and City of London police force areas on the number of offenders found guilty or cautioned by sex and age.

Juvenile Detainees

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what options are available to review the sentences of juveniles sentenced to detention during Her Majesty's pleasure if there is exceptional progress before the expiry of the tariff; how many cases have been reviewed in each year since 1983; and in how many cases in each year since 1983 early release has been authorised. [7927]

Miss Widdecombe: As the then Home Secretary announced on 30 November 1983, interim review procedures ensure that consideration can be given to any special circumstances or exceptional progress which might justify changing the Parole Board review date. Advancement of review dates under this policy, which applies equally to life sentenced prisoners and those detained during Her Majesty's pleasure or sentenced to custody for life, is exceptional. We have identified only four prisoners whose review dates have been advanced under this policy, none of whom was detained during Her Majesty's pleasure.

All life-sentenced prisoners, including those detained during Her Majesty's pleasure, are now given details of their tariff and may make representations about it at any time. All representations are carefully considered and a response is given.

Further statistical information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in each year since 1983 he has (a) increased, (b) decreased and (c) upheld the judicial recommendation on tariff for juveniles sentenced to detention at Her Majesty's pleasure. [7942]

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not readily available for the period requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, since the judgment in the House of Lords in 1993 in Doody, which requires the disclosure of tariff information and the consideration of representations, 22 persons convicted of murder, and sentenced to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure, have had a tariff set for the first time. Of these 22 tariffs: 20 are in line with the recommendation of the trial judge or of the Lord Chief Justice; and two are higher than the recommendations of both the trial judge and the Lord Chief Justice.

Similarly, 14 such persons whose tariffs had been set before the Doody judgment, have since had a fresh tariff set after submitting representations. Of these 14 fresh tariffs, three are lower than the first tariff. Two of these three lower tariffs are higher than, and one is in line with, the judicial recommendations. The remaining 11 new tariffs are the same as the original tariffs. In six of these 11 cases, the tariff has been set and has remained higher than the recommendations of both the trial judge and the Lord Chief Justice.

Court Cases (Departmental Costs)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list those cases in which writs have been served on his Department since May 1993 where the court found in favour of the plaintiff; and what were the costs incurred by his Department in defending those actions and any costs awarded against his Department in each case; [7962]

(2) if he will list those cases of judicial review since May 1993 in which the court ruled against his Department, the costs that were incurred by his Department and any costs that were awarded against his Department in each case. [7963]

Mr. Howard: The Home Office has been involved in several thousand judicial review applications since may 1993 and has been successful in more than 90 per cent. of them. The detailed information requested is not readily available.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8535]

Mr. Howard: Since 1 January 1996, 15 appointments have been made from names supplied by the public appointments unit. They were:

Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs: 1

Alcohol Education and Research Council: 1

Criminal Injuries Compensation Appeals Panel: 6 (reappointments)

Data Protection Tribunal: 4

Parole Board: 2

Police Information Technology Organisation: 1

Police Funding

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the appropriateness of the current police funding formula to meet the spending requirements of police authorities; what plans he has to review the spending needs formula; and if he will make a statement. [8339]

Mr. Maclean: The 1996–97 police funding formula is the best currently available means of assessing the relative needs of different police authorities. In 1997–98, as in 1996–97, we intend to consider with the allocation formula working group possible changes to the operation of the formula which may be suggested by the service, by police authorities and others.

Airgun Prosecutions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought in each year since 1990 for possession of an airgun without a licence. [7177]

Miss Widdecombe: Only high powered air weapons require a police certificate issued under section 1(1) of the Firearms Act 1968. It is not possible, from the information held centrally, to identify prosecutions in respect of this type of firearm from others covered by the above mentioned section of the Act.

Firearms Homicides

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information the recent survey of firearms homicide obtained on (a) the type of firearm used and (b) the type of homicide; and if he will make a statement. [7125]

Miss Widdecombe: The following table gives the information requested:

Firearms homicide—circumstances of offence by type of firearm, England and Wales 1992–94

Circumstances of homicide	Handguns	Shotguns	Other (and weapon type not known)	Total
Organised crime, drugs related, contract killing etc	40	15	4	59

Rwanda (Arms Sales)

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if the Isle of Man is subject to the UN embargo on the sale of arms of Rwanda; [7436]

(2) what steps he is taking to ensure that the Isle of Man is subject to the UN embargo on arms sales to Rwanda; [7439]

(3) when he issued a Privy Council order ensuring the UN embargo on the sale of arms to Rwanda applies to (a) the Isle of Man and (b) other Crown dependencies; and on what dates such other were issued; [7437]

(4) what procedures are followed by his Department to ensure that Crown dependencies are subject to the same UN embargoes as the UK; and what plans he has to review them. [7438]

Mr. Sackville: The Isle of Man is subject to the United Nations embargo on the sale of arms to Rwanda. An Order in Council—SI 1994-1637—was made on 24 June 1994 which applied this embargo to all persons within the United Kingdom and to any person elsewhere who was a British citizen or a body incorporated under United Kingdom law. Most residents in the three crown dependencies are British citizens and are covered by this order, as are companies incorporated in any of the islands if they are operating from within the United Kingdom.

Orders in Council, which will have the effect of extending the embargo to companies incorporated in the islands and operating from outside the United Kingdom and to foreign nationals in the islands, will be made later this month. An inter-departmental committee has been set up to examine the procedures within Government in relation to the trafficking in arms, and to determine whether there has been a gap in controls and, if so, what action needs to be taken.

Criminal Records

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which statutory provisions govern the length of time criminal records are retained by the police; and what plans he has to define retention criteria on the basis of those outlined in the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. [7550]

Mr. Maclean: There are no statutory provisions which govern the length of time criminal records are retained by the police. To ensure compliance with the data protection principles set out in the Data Protection Act 1984, the Association of Chief Police Officers—ACPO—issued a code of practice for police computer systems which includes guidelines on the removal of criminal record data when they are no longer required.

There are no plans to define the retention criteria on the basis of the rehabilitation periods set out in the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974.

The police hold criminal record information for various purposes, including crime prevention and detection and in order to supply antecedent information to the courts. Conviction information retains its value for these purposes for much longer then the rehabilitation periods set out in the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the items of personal data from the Phoenix system which would be disclosed (a) to data subjects via subject access and (b) to applicants on a criminal record certificate under the Data Protection Act 1984. [7551]

Mr. Maclean: Under the terms of the Data Protection Act 1984 individuals have the right, providing considerations of crime prevention do not arise, to see what information is held about them on Phoenix, the criminal records database on the police national computer. Subject to these considerations, data disclosed from Phoenix for subject access purposes would include name, address, sex, age, physical description, prosecution and conviction history, cautions, aliases, and modus operandi.

Criminal record certificates are not currently available. Under proposals being taken forward in the Police Bill, three types of certificate would be issued for employment and related purposes. In relation to the Phoenix database, criminal conviction certificates would show details of convictions which are "unspent" under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974; criminal record certificates and enhanced certificates, which would be available only for occupations and offices which are exceptions to the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, would show details of convictions and cautions.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what percentage of the population under the age of 35 years have a criminal record; and what proportion of these are male; [7548]

(2) how many individuals have criminal records which will never be spent under the terms of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. [7547]

Mr. Maclean: Information available centrally on the percentage of the population with a criminal record relates to conviction for standard list offences only. Standard list offences include all indictable offences—including those triable either way—plus the more serious summary offences.

Results from criminal histories of a sample of offenders born in 1953 indicate that 21 per cent. of the population born in that year were convicted of at least one standard list offence before the age of 35. Of these, 82 per cent. were male. This analysis also indicates that 0.4 per cent. of the population born in 1953 had a conviction by age 35 that will never be spent.

Police Paperwork

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average number of forms which the police have to complete in order to prosecute a young offender. [7440]

Mr. Maclean: In the event of a guilty plea being entered, the police are required to complete an average of six forms in order to prosecute a young offender. In the event of a not guilty plea being entered, the police would be required to complete an average of 12 forms. Additional forms may be needed in complex cases.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average number of forms which the police must complete to prosecute and adult offender. [7442]

Mr. Maclean: In the event of a guilty plea being entered, the police are required to complete an average of five forms in order to prosecute an adult offender. In the event of a not guilty plea being entered, the police would be required to complete an average of ten forms. Additional forms may be needed in complex cases.

"On the Record"

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to paragraph 44 of his Department's paper, "On the Record," Cm 3308, if he will list the steps he proposes to take to prevent enforced subject access; what legislative proposals he has to deal with this matter; and if he will make a statement. [7552]

Mr. Maclean: The new criminal conviction certificates proposed in the White Paper, "On the Record", will provide employers and others with a legitimate means of obtaining information about criminal convictions which are unspent under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. There would be no justification for the practice of enforced subject access once these are introduced. Should the practice continue after their introduction we shall consider what action should be taken to discourage or prevent it.

Prosecutions

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prosecutions of adult offenders were started in each of the last five years; [7443]

(2) how many prosecutions of young offenders were started in each of the last five years. [7441]

Mr. Maclean: The complexities of the criminal justice system and the constraints on resources in collating and processing data necessarily limit the amount of information collected routinely, and so only the final outcome of proceedings at magistrates' courts is collected centrally.

Information on the number of defendants proceeded against at magistrates courts by age group is published in the Command Paper, "Criminal Statistics England and Wales 1995"—latest available. Table 6.1 refers.

Copies of the publication are available in the Library.

Surrendered Guns

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what sums in compensation have been paid to owners of weapons voluntarily surrendered since the Hungerford killings under specific agreements made with the police; and what Government payments are outstanding in respect of claims for compensation. [7742]

Miss Widdecombe: There have been two Government schemes since 1987 where people have received payments in exchange for surrendering weapons which became prohibited under the firearms legislation. A total of £620,000 was paid in relation to claims following the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988. A total of £42,000 was paid in relation to claims following the Firearms (Amendment) Regulations 1992. The Department has considered all claims made under these schemes and advised claimants of the outcome. Offers have been made to all claimants entitled to receive compensation.

Imprisonment Terms

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals committed offences which have carried a term of imprisonment of (a) up to six months, (b) between six months and 12 months, (c) between 12 months and 18 months, (d) between 18 months and 24 months and (e) between 24 months and 29 months in the last year for which figures are available; and for (a) to (e) if he will list the relevant rehabilitation period for each category. [7549]

Mr. Maclean: Court proceedings data as requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The rehabilitation periods applicable to a conviction are subject to provisions as set out in the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974.

Firearms

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make compensation available to commercial establishments suffering loss of income as a result of new firearms legislation; and if he will make a statement. [7761]

Miss Widdecombe: We do not propose to make payments in relation to business losses. There is a clear distinction between compensation for property made unlawful as a result of Government legislation, where Government are obliged to compensate owners of that property, and compensation of business losses which result from Government legislation where there is no precedent for compensation being paid.

Miss Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what compensation Her Majesty's Government will pay for accessories for firearms newly banned by regulation; and if he will make a statement. [7803]

Miss Widdecombe: Payments will be made in respect of ancillary equipment which is designed or adapted for use in connection with the firearms which the Bill seeks to ban, and which has no practicable use in connection with any non-prohibited weapons. Payments will be made only where the claimant lawfully held, or was contracted to acquire, the equipment on 16 October.

Payments will be at market value immediately prior to 16 October. We shall be assessing how to set market value in discussion with the British Shooting Sports Council.

Miss Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make additional funding available to the police in 1997 to curb ownership of illegally held firearms; and if he will make a statement. [7783]

Miss Widdecombe: Although my right hon. and learned Friend has made no specific provision for this purpose, the spending power of police authorities will increase by 3.7 per cent. or £247 million in 1997–98. Tackling illegally-held firearms remains a high priority of the Government and the police.

European Year Against Racism

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources he will be making available to support initiatives relating to the declaration of 1997 as the European Year Against Racism. [7799]

Mr. Kirkhope: The Home Office, in co-operation with the Commission for Racial Equality, is committing resources to co-ordination and administration of the European Year Against Racism within the United Kingdom. In common with other Government Departments, it will be involved in a number of initiatives relating to the European year in its own areas of responsibility. Details will be announced at the appropriate time. The success of this initiative will depend on the continuing commitment of organisations across the country to play a full part in action to improve race relations and equality of opportunity.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum have been refused on safe third country grounds since (a) 1 January and (b) 1 September. [7810]

Mr. Kirkhope: A total of 1,390 principal applicants were refused asylum on safe third country grounds between 1 January and 30 November 1996; of these 530 were refused in the months of September, October and November.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many asylum seekers, having been refused asylum on safe third country grounds, have been removed or have made a voluntary departure from the United Kingdom in each month since 1 January; [7809]

(2) how many asylum seekers, having been refused asylum on safe third country grounds, were removed or made a voluntary departure from the United Kingdom in (a) 1994 and (b) 1995. [7813]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is given in the table. The information for 1996 is provisional.

Number of removals and voluntary departures of those refused asylum on safe third country grounds, 1994–95, January to October 1996

[1] Provisional figures.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many appeals against a refusal of asylum are currently being processed by his Department; and how many appeals against a refusal of asylum, having been processed by his Department and dispatched to the immigration appellate authority, are awaiting determination by the immigration appellate authority. [7811]

Mr. Kirkhope: As at 31 October, there were 1,230 asylum appeals awaiting validation and preparation by the Asylum Directorate and 19,600 appeals awaiting a hearing by the Immigration Appellate Authority.

Racial Discrimination

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to publish the 1996 report on racial discrimination in the criminal justice system. [7778]

Mr. Maclean: The booklet, "Race and Criminal Justice System" was published by my right hon. and learned Friend in March this year. We intend to publish next year information on the results of the extension of ethnic monitoring of police activity.

Released Prisoners (Accommodation)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedures are in place to monitor the type of accommodation to which prisoners are released; and what plans he has to publish national statistics on the proportion of prisoners released to (i) temporary accommodation, (ii) permanent accommodation and (iii) no fixed abode. [6653]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 10 December 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General, to reply to your recent Question about what procedures are in place to monitor the type of accommodation to which prisoners are released and what plans there are to publish national statistics on the proportion of prisoners released to different types of accommodation.

These statistics are not collected centrally, and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. There are therefore no plans to publish such information.

Research has highlighted three key factors in helping ex-prisoners retain their homes: the quality of family relationships, the availability of housing benefit, and their financial status, which is linked to employment, training and educational opportunities. A range of support is therefore provided to prisoners to assist them in obtaining suitable accommodation on release. This includes:

- provision of housing and employment advice through officers specially trained by the NACRO Prison Link Unit;
- advice on benefit entitlements;
- assistance in maintaining family ties, for example through visits, correspondence and access to cardphones;
- maximising opportunities for employment, training and education;
- release on temporary licence for suitable prisoners for work, training and education, and to assist with resettlement towards the end of their sentences.
- inmate development and pre-release training, which aims to teach prisoners skills to cope with major resettlement problems;
- sentence planning, which assists the prisoner in planning for release;
- provision of a Directory of Help Agencies, which provides information on agencies providing assistance to ex-offenders locally.

Further assistance is available from the Probation Service to ex-prisoners on statutory supervision following release.

Detention Costs

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total amount of detention costs reclaimed from carrying companies in (a) 1995 and (b) 1996 to date. [7787]

Mr. Kirkhope: In the financial year 1995–96, the Home Office recovered some £372,000 in detention costs from carrying companies. In the current financial year to 30 November, the amount so far received is £417,000.

Anti-stalking Laws

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which other countries' anti-stalking laws his Department has assessed in drawing up anti-stalking legislation; and if he will make a statement. [7794]

Mr. Maclean: My officials examined the approaches to stalking adopted in the United States of America, Canada and Australia. These generally only criminalise acts which are already offences in the United Kingdom, and we therefore concluded that the United Kingdom would have to develop a new approach. Our proposals are contained in the Protection from Harassment Bill, introduced on 5 December.

Television Licences

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the number of children taken into care over the last five years following the imprisonment of a parent for television licence fine default. [7781]

Mr. Maclean: Information to make the relevant assessment is not available centrally.

Harassment

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been convicted of causing intentional harassment, alarm or distress under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. [7796]

Mr. Maclean: In 1995, 40 persons were convicted for the offence of "causing intentional harassment, alarm of distress" under section 154 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

Detainees

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of a person detained under Immigration Act powers were reviewed by the director of the immigration service in (a) 1995 and (b) 1996 to date. [7807]

Mr. Kirkhope: Taking their respective caseloads together, the two directors of the Immigration Service reviewed detention in about 450 cases in 1995 and about 700 cases to date in 1996.

Venezuelan Prisoners

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Venezuelan citizens are being detained in prisons in the United Kingdom. [7307]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Keith Vaz, dated 10 December 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking how many Venezuelan citizens are being detained in prisons in the United Kingdom.

On 31 October 1996 (the latest date for which figures are available) there were 13 Venezuelan nationals in custody in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales. Information on prisoners in Scotland and in Northern Ireland is available from the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of cases currently awaiting a hearing before the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board; how many cases have been cleared each quarter for each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [7944]

Mr. Maclean: The number of cases currently awaiting hearing before the board is some 26,000. The number of such cases cleared in the period April 1993 to March 1996 is as follows:

Quarter	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
April–June	2,388	3,241	2,334
July–September	2,685	2,751	2,274
October–December	2,560	3,033	2,796
January–March	3,315	2,254	2,831
Total	10,948	11,279	10,235

Early this year the membership of the board was increased from 44 to 49 to assist in tackling the backlog arising from the 1990 common law damages based scheme. The board is aiming to clear 12,000 appeals cases in 1996–97 and more in 1997–98. On 1 April 1996, a new tariff-based scheme was introduced with a separate appeals panel established to provide a wholly independent system for appeals and to deal with them more speedily.

Offences (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners convicted for offences which can be regarded as related to the situation in Northern Ireland are currently held in prisons in Great Britain; [6744]

(2) how many prisoners convicted for offences which can be regarded as related to the situation in Northern Ireland have been transferred from Great Britain to (a) Northern Ireland and (b) the Republic of Ireland, since 9 February. [6745]

Miss Widdecombe: Nineteen prisoners convicted of terrorist-related offences in connection with the situation in Northern Ireland are currently held in prisons in England and Wales. A further nine prisoners have been temporarily transferred to prisons in Northern Ireland. Four prisoners are currently held in Scotland.

Since 9 February 1996, one prisoner has been temporarily transferred to a prison in Northern Ireland and five prisoners have been repatriated to prisons in the Republic of Ireland from prisons in England and Wales. One prisoner has been temporarily transferred from Scotland to Northern Ireland.

Prisons (Drugs)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the accuracy of drug tests being carried out in the Prison Service. [6250]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 10 December 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about representations received concerning the accuracy of drug tests carried out by the Prison Service.

Mandatory drug testing is a new procedure, and as such has been subject to several representations, including some about the accuracy of the drug tests carried out. Individual prisoners may also have raised concerns through the requests/complaints procedure, but these are not recorded centrally.

Prisoners have a right to challenge the results of a test specifically by requesting an independent analysis of a portion of the sample they provided which is retained for this purpose. Release of this sample is authorised at Prison Service Headquarters. To date 15 requests have been received from solicitors acting on behalf of prisoners in challenging the result of a particular test. These requests include supply of the sample itself, for the purposes of independent analysis, or for the documentation which supports the initial test result.

In addition, on 7 May the Head of Healthcare at HMP Wealstun noted that there were conflicting results on the same inmate on occasions when he had done a voluntary drug test, analysed at Harrogate District Hospital within a day or so of the Mandatory Drug Test. He was asked to furnish the data which led to his concerns so that investigation could take place and remedial action taken as necessary. These details have not been furnished and so the specific cases have not been followed up.

There always will be differences in the results of tests used by medical officers for therapeutic purposes and those produced through the Mandatory Drug Testing programme since the purposes are different. The latter operates to agreed threshold levels, and prisoners are only found to have tested positive once this threshold is exceeded. This is to ensure that when a charge is laid on the basis of a positive confirmation test result it is beyond reasonable doubt that the prisoner took the drug in question. Some changes have been made to the method of testing for opiates since July which now ensure that opiate use is more likely to be picked up from a Mandatory Drug Test.

On 15 July the Chairman of the Board of Visitors at Downview prison raised concerns about three prisoners who had screened positive for opiates and three who had screened positive for benzodiazepines in early June. All had been found negative through confirmation testing. The opiate results were attributed to the absence of an hydrolysis process from confirmation testing, which resulted in a number of samples that correctly screened positive for opiates confirmation testing negative. Hydrolysis was introduced on 2 July.

In two of the cases involving benzodiazepines, the prisoners had been prescribed a combination of medications which cross-reacted with the reagent used in the screening test. Confirmation testing uses a different technology which avoids such cross-reactions. In the third case it is thought that the sample may have been positive for an uncommon type of benzodiazepine which is not recognised in confirmation testing. The Prison Service, in conjunction with the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, is considering ways of extending the range of drugs detected by confirmation testing.

On 5 August the Kent Area Manager raised concerns about six samples from Blantyre House prison which had screened positive for cannabis, but were all found to be negative on confirmation. It was discovered that for a period of 1½ hours on 5 July the screen testing machine had been mis-calibrated, producing 84 false positive results. all prisons affected were notified. The Laboratory of the Government Chemist has since introduced more rigorous quality control procedures, ensuring that results do not leave the laboratory until all checks have been made.

Replica and Imitation Firearms

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences were carried out in each year using (a) replica firearms which were capable of being modified to fire ammunition and (b) imitation firearms incapable of being so modified. [7045]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 2 December 1996]: The available information relates to the number of offences where imitation firearms of all types were used. The figure includes replicas, but further details are not collected centrally.

Such figures are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales". Copies of these publications are in the Library.

In England and Wales in 1995, 378 notifiable offences were recorded by the police in which imitation firearms were reported to have been used.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what considerations led him to place controls on only those replica firearms which can be modified to fire ammunition. [7047]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 2 December 1996]: The Firearms Act 1982 applies licensing controls to imitation firearms which are so constructed or adapted as to be readily convertible into a functioning firearm. Other toy and imitation firearms pose no danger in themselves. The use of imitation firearms of any kind in furtherance of crime carries the same penalty as the use of a real firearm: life imprisonment.

"Misspent Youth, Young People and Crime"

Mr. Alex Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Audit Commission report "Misspent Youth, Young People and Crime". [7507]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 9 December 1996]: The Government welcome the Audit Commission's recommendations on a strategy for early intervention to deal with children and young people at risk of offending. The Government will be proposing this approach in a Green Paper to be published shortly. The Government do not agree with the proposition that it is right to caution repeat offenders; they should be brought before the courts to face the consequences of their crimes.

Young Offenders Institutions

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many 15 and 16-year-olds have been detained in young offenders institutions in each year since 1992. [7153]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 3 December 1996]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. John Hutton, dated 10 December 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking, how many 15 and 16 year olds have been detained in young offenders institutions in each year since 1992.

The available information is for the population of 15 and 16 year olds held after sentence of detention in a young offender institution on 30 June each year. This is published in successive volumes of "Prison statistics, England and Wales" (table 3.2 of the 1995 edition, Cm 3355), copies of which are available from the library.

Provisional information for 30 June 1996 is given in the attached table.

Population of 15 and 16 year olds in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales on 30 June 1996[1] sentenced to detention in a YOI

Butane Gas Sales (Prosecutions)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought in each of the last five years for sales of butane gas to minors; and if he will provide a regional breakdown where available. [7751]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Information collected centrally under the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Act 1985 does not identify the substance involved.

Drug Dealers

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, (1) pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, columns 471–72, if he will set out the methodology which leads to the conclusion that around 120 of those convicted of class A offences in 1994 had two or more previous offences; [7918]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, columns 471–72, if he will list the offences regarded as similar offences to class A drug trafficking offences. [7919]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The methodology involved creating a sample of third-time drug traffickers from the "Offenders Index", which contains criminal histories from 1963, and using a separate dataset on offenders dealt with for drug offences to establish which offences involved class A drugs where this was not known on the "Offenders Index". The offences included were those relating to the unlawful importation or exportation of a controlled drug, production or being concerned in production of a controlled drug, supplying or offering to supply a controlled drug and having possession of a controlled drug with intent to supply.

The study did not provide estimates of the number of offenders convicted of a first or second offence, or a monthly breakdown. Of those convicted of a third or subsequent offence, 90 per cent. received a custodial sentence and the average sentence length was just over four years. The period of the study was October to December 1994.

Speed Cameras

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what sums were paid in fines as a result of convictions on the basis of evidence obtained from speed cameras in (a) Dorset and (b) England in each of the last three years for which figures are available; and what is his estimate of the level of fines which will be imposed in each of these areas in the current financial year. [7752]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 9 December 1996]: The information requested is not available.

The majority of offences of speeding detected by automatic cameras are dealt with by fixed penalty notice, the current charge being £40. The number of such offences for Dorset and England are contained in the table.

Information is not available to distinguish whether or not speeding offences dealt with by fines were detected by automatic cameras, but the average fine for all speeding offences in England and Wales is also shown, along with the number of camera detected offences dealt with by court proceedings.

No estimates are made of future fine levels likely to be imposed.

Speeding offences by how detected and how dealt with and average fines

	Camera detected offences dealt with by fixed penalty		Camera detected offences dealt with by court proceedings		Average fine for speeding (all such offences)
	Dorset	England	Dorset	England	England and wales
1993	1,129	25,767	[1]—	6,374	127
1994	5,046	95,510	[1]—	20,573	113
1995	5,951	168,536	125	36,274	107

[1] Information not available for Dorset for 1993 and 1994. However, in those years respectively, 12 and 63 offences of all kinds detected by cameras were reported for summons.

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from police forces seeking additional resources for the provision of speed cameras. [7753]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 9 December 1996]: In the last two years, representations on this issue have been received from some five forces and/or their police authorities.

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will establish a review into the merits of returning the sums paid in fines as a result of convictions on the basis of evidence from speed cameras to (a) the relevant police authority and (b) the relevant local authority. [7754]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 9 December 1996]: No. Fine income from the enforcement of speeding offences by cameras, like all other fine income from criminal offences, goes to the Consolidated Fund at the Treasury. It is not the Government's general policy to earmark that income to a particular area of expenditure.

HEALTH

Health Authority Funding

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities no longer fund (i) obstructive sleep apnoea referrals and (ii) sex change assessments and operations. [7278]

Mr. Malone: Information about health authority purchasing decisions is not held centrally. Each case should be decided on its clinical merits.

Prostate Cancer

Sir Julian Critchley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will allocate more funds to research into, and finding a cure for, prostate cancer; [7463]

(2) if he will encourage general practitioners to take a blood test for prostate cancer as part of routine examinations for men over 40 years. [7460]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health's standing group on health technology has identified carcinoma of the prostate as one of the priority areas for health technology assessment. Two systematic reviews of the diagnosis, management and screening of early localised prostate cancer, commissioned by the Department, have recently been completed. The reports found no justification for the routine use of the prostate specific antigen blood test by general practitioners. There is at present no evidence that the number of prostate cancer deaths could be reduced by screening asymptomatic men. Screening may also lead to unnecessary investigations and treatment, with the risk of inducing anxiety and adverse physical side effects.

The Department's national screening committee will consider screening for prostate cancer as part of its programme of reviews of a wide range of screening programmes in the national health service. Other research projects are under way. The national screening committee will consider any new scientific evidence as it becomes available.

Douglas Byelong

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the names of the mental health tribunal and clinical team who assessed Douglas Byelong as fit to live in the community; and what assessment he has made of the current system for assessing whether patients detained on mental and criminal grounds should be released. [7814]

Mr. Burns: It is a statutory requirement that the names of persons concerned in tribunal proceedings should not be made public. The mental health review tribunals are independent judicial bodies and their procedures are defined in the mental health review tribunal rules made by the Lord Chancellor. Copies of the rules are available in the Library. The Department of Health has recently commissioned a research study into the decision making process of the tribunals.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the names of past and present members of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority and the Genetics Commission who have been, or are, members of the British Eugenics Society or the Galton Institute. [7896]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not held centrally.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been allocated to support research into the causes and treatment of MS in each year since 1990. [7804]

Mr. Malone: Funding specifically on multiple sclerosis from the Department of Health and the Medical Research Council since 1990 appears in the table.

1989–90: £182,000

1990–91: £181,000

1991–92: £80,000

1992–93: £64,000

1993–94: £154,000

1994–95: £207,000

1995–96: £216,000.

Note:

The MRC also undertakes work under the broader headings of autoimmune disorders and diseases of the central nervous system (£6,280,000 in 1995–96), and neurodegenerative diseases, all of which underpin research into MS.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the amount allocated by each health authority in England to (a) beta-interferon and (b) other drugs used in the treatment of people with MS for the most recent available year; and what sums were spent. [7805]

Mr. Malone: Information is not collected centrally on the amounts allocated for beta-interferon or other individual drugs by individual health authorities.

I refer the hon. Member to my response to the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) on 4 November, column 404 for the latest information on spending on beta-interferon drugs. It is not possible to identify the amount spent on other drugs used in the treatment of patients with multiple sclerosis.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of multi-drug-resistant TB have been diagnosed in each of the last five years. [7967]

Mr. Horam: In 1992, the Public Health Laboratory Service carried out a review of the occurrence of drug resistance in cases of tuberculosis in England and Wales between 1982 and 1991. The review was published in 1993. In 1993, an enhanced surveillance system—the United Kingdom mycobacterial resistance network, MYCOBNET—was established by the PHLS communicable disease surveillance centre to monitor drug resistance in isolates of mycobacterium tuberculosis. Data from the review and the MYCOBNET system are as listed. Direct comparison between the numbers of multi-drug resistant isolates identified during the two periods is not possible because of the different methods used to obtain the information. Multi-drug resistant cases account for around 1 per cent. of notified cases of tuberculosis.

Antibiotics

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the extent of over-prescribing of antibiotics. [8040]

Mr. Malone: No assessment has been made. Health authority medical and pharmaceutical advisers routinely monitor all prescribing by general practitioners, including antibiotic prescribing, to ensure drugs are used appropriately. Local microbiologists and physicians are responsible for the control of infectious diseases, and advise doctors on local bacterial resistance, and advising on antibiotic use and choice. However, it is up to individual clinicians to provide the most effective treatment for the individual patient.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8544]

Mr. Horam: The public appointments unit provides names of suitably qualified candidates for consideration for a wide range of appointments. Information on the source of names of individual appointees to public bodies could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

BSE and CJD

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 4 December, Official Report, columns 720–21, if he will list the unqualified evidence linking BSE and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease assessed by his Department (a) before and (b) since 25 March; and if he will make a statement. [8341]

Mr. Horam: There is no unqualified evidence linking bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee's advice has been drawn up on the basis of the balance of probabilities considering all the various evidence available. Its view is that a connection between exposure to BSE and new variant CJD is likely but not conclusively established.

Section 64 Grants

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the grants which have been made available under section 64 in 1996 by organisation and amount of grant. [6672]

Mr. Burns [holding answer 28 November 1996]: The information requested has been placed in the Library. Grants of the amounts shown to voluntary organisations have been approved for payment during the current financial year.

Care Home Residents

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in United Kingdom care homes have preserved rights to income support; what proportion of these people are charged more than they receive from income support; in what circumstances individuals who cannot meet these extra charges are evicted from care homes; and if he will make a statement. [6124]

Mr. Roger Evans: I have been asked to reply.

The latest available information for the United Kingdom as a whole is for May 1994. It is estimated that in May 1994 there were 228,000 cases in the United Kingdom with preserved rights to income support. Of these 58,000, 25 per cent., had charges exceeding the total income support received.

For a person with preserved rights to the higher levels of income support, the arrangements for the provision of care and the actual level of charges are a matter between the resident and proprietor of the residential care or nursing home. In exceptional circumstances the local authority may be able to arrange alternative accommodation if a person is being evicted.

Notes:

1. Numbers are rounded to the nearest thousand.
2. Sample size 5 per cent.
3. Numbers refer to benefit units which may be a single person or a couple.

SCOTLAND

Self-governing Schools

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much his Department has spent to date on promoting the development of self-governing status for local authority schools; and what action it has taken to do this. [7164]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: In line with usual practice for legislation, the Scottish Office education and industry department has published factual advice about the Self-Governing Schools etc. (Scotland) Act 1989 which explains all matters relating to self-governing schools and the procedures set out in that Act. These publications are for the benefit of school boards, parents, teachers and others wishing to be fully informed about these matters. The costs are met from general departmental provision and are not separately identifiable. In addition the Department organised a national conference in September 1993 which was attended by over 200 delegates representing schools and other bodies throughout Scotland.

In October 1996, following competitive tender, my right hon. Friend appointed Mr. Ian Dutton, a former Director of Education of Borders regional council, as a consultant on self-governing matters. His role is to provide information and support to existing self-governing schools and to school boards, parents and others wishing to consider the option of their school becoming self-governing, or simply wishing to know more about the practical aspects of this policy.

Water Authorities

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the West of Scotland water authority's right of appeal against the refusal of planning permission by Kyle and district council for a new sewage treatment works at Greenan lapses. [7423]

Mr. Kynoch: The West of Scotland water authority has already exercised its right to appeal against the refusal of planning permission. The case has been sited until 25 February to allow both parties to seek to reach a compromise over planning permission. If no agreement seems in prospect, and the appeal is not withdrawn, the matter will go to a public local inquiry and determination by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the West of Scotland water authority to make a final decision on the Ayr sewerage scheme. [7425]

Mr. Kynoch: The West of Scotland water authority will meet on Friday 13 December when consideration will be given to the outcome of a detailed review of the options for treating the sewage collected from Ayr.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many complaints have been lodged to date with the Scottish water and sewerage customers council. [7429]

Mr. Kynoch: The Scottish Water and Sewerage Customers Council had received 171 complaints to Monday 2 December 1996.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been spent to date on the establishment and operating costs of the Scottish water and sewerage customers council; and how much will be spent on the council's operation during the current financial year. [7428]

Mr. Kynoch: During the period up to 31 March 1996 the establishment and operating costs were £239,000. In the present financial year 1996–97, the council has a budget of £1.2 million which is wholly funded by a levy on the water and sewerage authorities.

Beaches

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each year since 1991 those beaches which complied with the EU bathing water directive standard guide for (a) total and faecal coliforms, (b) faecal streptococci and (c) coliforms and faecal streptococci combined. [7446]

Mr. Kynoch: The beaches which, since 1991, have complied with the EU bathing water directive standard guide for (a) total and faecal coliforms, (b) faecal streptococci and (c) coliforms and faecal streptococci is set out in the table:

Total and faecal coliforms	Faecal streptococci	Coliforms and faecal streptococci combined
1991 Cullen, Gullane 1992 Cullen, St. Andrews West Sands, Dunbar Belhaven, Pease Bay	No testing was made for (b) or (c) until 1993
1993 St. Andrews West Sands, Gullane, Dunbar Belhaven	Aberdour Silversands, Gullane, Dunbar Belhaven	Gullane, Dunbar Belhaven
1994 Cullen, Montrose, St. Andrews West Sands, Aberdour Silversands, Dunbar Belhaven, Pease Bay	Nairn, Cullen, Montrose, Arbroath, Carnoustie, St. Andrews West Sands, Aberdour Silversands, Yellowcraigs, Dunbar Belhaven, Pease Bay	Cullen, Montrose, St. Andrews West Sands, Aberdour Silversands, Dunbar Belhaven, Pease Bay
1995 Cullen, St. Andrews West Sands, Aberdour Silversands, Gullane, Dunbar Belhaven	Nairn, Cullen, Fraserburgh, Arbroath, St. Andrews West Sands, Aberdour Silversands, Gullane, Pease Bay	Cullen, St. Andrews West Sands, Aberdour Silversands, Gullane
1996 Aberdeen, St. Andrews West Sands, Aberdour Silversands, Gullane, Dunbar Belhaven, Pease Bay	Fraserburgh, Aberdeen, Montrose, St. Andrews West Sands, Gullane, Dunbar Belhaven, Pease Bay	Aberdeen, St. Andrews West Sands, Gullane, Dunbar Belhaven, Pease Bay

Sugar Refinery Closure

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what discussions he has had with representatives of Tate and Lyle plc about the cost of refined sugar delivered to industrial customers in Scotland following the announced closure of its cane sugar refinery in Greenock; and if he will make a statement; [7160]

(2) what recent discussions he has had with representatives of Tate anent Lyle plc about its proposals relating to the construction and staffing of a depot and warehouse in the Glasgow area; and if he will make a statement. [7161]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 4 December 1996]: My right hon. Friend has had no discussions with the company about these matters. Just as its arrangements for distributing its products are best left to a company, the prices it charges its customers is a matter for negotiation, again best left to supplier and customer.

Legal Aid

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he has taken in the last three years in respect of individuals submitting applications for legal aid which give false or misleading information abcut their personal circumstances. [7953]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is a matter for the Scottish Legal Aid Board, and I have no power to intervene. The board may employ a range of measures in these circumstances, including issuing a warning letter, terminating the grant of legal aid, recovering legal aid granted on the basis of false information, or in the worst case, reporting the applicant to the police or the procurator fiscal.

Housing (Falkirk)

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the letter of 28 November from the Minister with responsibility for education, housing and fisheries to the hon. Member for Falkirk, West, if he will make a statement on (a) the independent valuation of the Scottish Homes housing stock in each housing estate in the Falkirk council area and (b) the funding and staffing assistance which the Paragon Housing Association receives from Scottish Homes. [8266]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 9 December 1996]: In line with guidance given by the Secretary of State, Scottish Homes obtains an independent valuation of the houses in any ballot area where it proposes to transfer stock to an alternative landlord. This valuation is subsequently used as a benchmark against which final decisions are taken. This arrangement is consistent with a recommendation made by the National Audit Office.

I understand that, in accordance with its procedures for providing seedcorn funding and staffing assistance to new and emerging housing associations, Scottish Homes has provided Paragon housing association with £39,000 and the assistance of one member of staff seconded to the association for two days a week.

DEFENCE

Air Training Corp

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of the Air Training Corp and the Army Cadet Force. [8087]

Mr. Soames: The role of the Air Training Corps, as stated in the objects of the corps, is:

(a) to promote and encourage among young people a practical interest in aviation and the Royal Air Force;

(b) to provide training which will be useful both in the services and in civil life;

(c) to foster the spirit of adventure and to develop the qualities of leadership and good citizenship.

The role of the Army Cadet Force, as stated in its charter, is to inspire young people to achieve success in life with a spirit of service to the Queen, their country and their local community, and to develop in them the qualities of a good citizen. This aim is achieved by:

(a) providing progressive cadet training, often of a challenging and exciting nature, to foster confidence, self reliance, initiative, loyalty, and a sense of service to others;

(b) encouraging the development of personal powers of practical leadership and the ability to work successfully as a member of a team;

(c) stimulating an interest in the Army, its achievements, skills and values;

(d) advising and preparing those considering a career in the services or with the reserve forces.

Radiation Testing

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what records his Department maintains in respect of when tests of radioactive material on humans began at the atomic research establishments at (a) Harwell and (b) Aldermaston. [8288]

Mr. Soames: Other than to emphasise that Harwell is not a MoD establishment, I have nothing to add to the response I gave to the hon Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) on 2 December 1996, Official Report, column 534.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what monitoring (a) has taken place and (b) there is currently of the health of people who were the subject of tests on the effects of radioactive material. [8295]

Mr. Soames: I have nothing to add to the response I gave to the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) on 2 December 1996, Official Report, column 534–35).

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the basis for the letter dated 9 February from the manager, administration and public relations at Aldermaston in respect of radiation experiments on human subjects at Aldermaston. [8289]

Mr. Soames: I assume the hon. Member is referring to a letter dated 9 February, 1994, which was sent by the manager administration and public relations, AWE Aldermaston, in response to an inquiry from Dr. A. Victorian about human radiation experiments at AWE. It was considered by my Department at the time that his inquiry had been prompted by publicity about unethical experiments conducted by the US authorities many years ago; hence the terms of the reply. Details of Aldermaston's involvement in a number of entirely ethical experiments carried out in the 1980s were forwarded to Dr. Victorian in December last year in response to his subsequent inquiries. The suggestion of denials does not therefore arise.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements are in place for compensating people subjected to experimental exposure to radioactive material if they subsequently develop health problems associated with such exposure. [8290]

Mr. Soames: My Department will pay compensation whenever it is properly due. We are not aware of any compensation claim in which a claimant could show, either to my Department or in a court of law, that he has an injury or illness which was, more likely than not, caused by experimental exposure to radiation.

Mid-Air Collisions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent assessment he has made of the probability of a mid-air collision involving RAF fast jets over United Kingdom air space. [8212]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to his previous questions on this subject, on 9 January, Official Report, column 96 and 17 January 1996, Official Report, column 581. The study referred to in these answers is still under way and now expected to be completed in early 1997.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the references in the United Kingdom radioactive waste inventory to the option of storing complete submarine reactor compartments ashore; and what review Her Majesty's Government are making of the policy of dismantling such reactor plant for storage at the proposed Nirex repository. [7464]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Government consider that it is appropriate for decommissioned nuclear-powered submarines to be stored safely afloat at the location where they are decommissioned, pending final disposal. This policy is kept under review to take account of technical or other developments. Our current assessment is that interim storage afloat provides a safe and cost effective route to final disposal.

As is stated in the UK NIREX 1994 radioactive waste inventory other alternatives to interim storage afloat, including the removal of the rector compartment in one piece and its storage on land, are kept under review.

The perceived final disposal route for the intermediate level waste remaining in the reactor compartments of decommissioned submarines is the deep repository being developed by NIREX, early next century.

West Indies Guardship

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of the West Indies Guardship in inhibiting the flow of drugs from South America. [7951]

Mr. Soames: In addition to her other duties, the West Indies Guardship—WIGS—together with her Royal Fleet Auxiliary tanker, makes a very considerable and valuable contribution to the international fight against drug trafficking in the Caribbean, which is one of the major trafficking routes for drugs from South America. WIGS has, in recent years, been directly involved in the interception of substantial amounts of illegal drugs in the region.

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to receive the latest annual report of the chief constable of the Ministry of Defence police. [7973]

Mr. Soames: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to receive the chief constable's annual report for financial year 1995–96 within the next two weeks. Copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

Volunteers (Compensation)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his policy towards compensation claims made by volunteers in experiments conducted by agencies for which he is responsible. [8615]

Mr. Soames: My Department will pay compensation whenever it is properly due. We are not aware of any compensation claim in which a claimant could show, either to my Department or in a court of law, that he has an injury or illness which was, more likely than not, caused by experiments conducted by agencies or establishments for which my Department is responsible.

Joint Strike Fighter

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contribution he has made to the costs of the joint strike fighter project of the United States and in which year those costs were incurred; what were the financial terms of the contribution; and under what circumstances the contribution can be reclaimed. [8511]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Ministry of Defence has contributed $13,022,539 to the United States joint strike fighter programme. These costs were incurred this year. We have agreed to contribute a total of $200 million to the programme between 1996 and 2000. This contribution represents 10 per cent. of the cost of work related to the short take-off, vertical landing variant of the aircraft during the concept demonstration phase of the programme. We expect British companies to gain work of at least equivalent value in this phase of the programme. The terms of the United Kingdom's contribution are set down in a memorandum of understanding with the United States Department of Defence which was signed in December 1995, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House. We do not currently envisage any circumstances under which the United Kingdom's contribution would be reclaimed although continuation of work on the programme is subject to evidence of satisfactory progress.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8543]

Mr. Arbuthnot: In the last year, amongst the Department's public bodies as listed in "Public Bodies", two individuals originally identified by the public appointments unit were reappointed to their positions on the Advisory Committee on Conscientious Objectors.

Deveonport Dockyard

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on the privatisation of Devonport dockyard. [8454]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is hoped to make a further announcement on the proposed privatisation of Devonport royal dockyard within the next few weeks.

Directorate General Ships

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on defence agency status for the Navy's DG Ships organisation. [8703]

Mr. Soames: The Directorate General Ships was formed within the naval support command in October 1995 to gather together different elements of the Royal Navy's engineering and material support functions. The organisation is responsible for directing the in-service support of surface ships and submarines and their equipments; for ensuring that proper consideration is given to support issues and marine engineering design requirements in the procurement of new naval platforms; and for the ownership and management of the naval stores inventory except for fuel and food. It contributes to the operational capability of the Royal Navy, together with other areas of the naval support command, to ensure the overall material availability, reliability and maintainability of front line military equipment. The main internal customer is the Commander-in-Chief Fleet, although the organisation is also closely engaged with the procurement executive in minimising the support costs of new vessels and equipments.

Internal review since its formation has shown that the services of the organisation will be most effectively delivered in the future by establishing it as a defence agency. It is therefore being launched on Wednesday 11 December as the Ships Support Agency. As a defence agency it remains part of the Department, but the chief executive has been delegated the necessary powers to discharge his responsibilities.

The Ships Support Agency comprises a headquarters at Foxhill, Bath, and currently occupies six other main sites—at Copenacre, Devonport, Eaglescliffe, Portsmouth, Rosyth and Weymouth. It employs some 2,800 staff, of whom 2,450 are civil servants, with the balance being military. Between 1996 and 2001 it is intended to collocate the organisation on the site occupied by the procurement executive at Abbey Wood, in Bristol, although project contract management staff will remain at Devonport and Rosyth naval dockyards and at Portsmouth naval base.

The Ships Support Agency has developed a comprehensive set of performance indicators in conjunction with its owner and customers. These include measures to monitor the quality, timeliness and efficiency of the agency's outputs. The targets which have been agreed, for the period up to March 1997, are:

Materially Available Vessel Days (MAVDs)

1. To provide the Royal Navy with the agreed percentage of materially available vessel days: 62 per cent.

Pounds per MAVD

2. To provide the agreed Fleet availability cost-effectively: £5,000 per MAVD

To refine the £ MAVD Performance Indicator

3. Progress Report: March 1997

Upkeep Period Timeliness

4. To deliver upkeep periods within specified tolerances of the agreed programme: + 5 per cent.

Upkeep Period Costs

5. To contain the outturn cost of programmed upkeep periods within tolerance of the predicted cost: +/-5 per cent.

Upkeep Material Performance

6. To introduce a performance indicator to quantify material state at the conclusion of upkeep periods Progress report. March 1997

Fleet Time Material Performance

7. To limit the average number of outstanding operational defects per vessel in fleet time: 4

8. To introduce a performance indicator to measure the percentage of fleet time that vessels are unable for material reasons to meet their programmed task: March 1997

Efficient Stockholding

9. To improve stockholding to stock issue ration. 2.6:1

Resource Accounting

10. To ensure the implementation of the MOD accruals accounting system within the agency—progress report: March 1997

Through Life Costs

11. To create an effective through life cost model—Progress report. March 1997

Private Sector Involvement

12. To complete a review of the options for further Private Sector involvement in the support of vessels, equipment and weapons—Progress report. March 1997

Benchmarking

13. To draw up a comprehensive benchmarking programme: March 1997

Copies of the corporate plan and framework documents have been placed in the Library of the House.

Naval Bases and Supply Agency

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on defence agency status for the naval bases and supply organisation. [8702]

Mr. Soames: The directorate general naval bases and supply was formed within the naval support command in October 1995, bringing together management of the three naval bases with the navy's supply depots and the Director Marine Services (Navy).

The organisation is responsible in war, crisis and peace for:

providing ships and submarines with engineering and support services during fleet time;

the worldwide supply, storage and maintenance of armament, engineering and general stores, weapons and equipments;

the supply of food and fuel;

accommodation and Naval Personnel support in the naval bases, thus contributing to the operational capability of the armed forces, together with other areas of the naval support command to ensure the overall material availability, capability and readiness of the Royal Navy and its weapon systems.

A wide ranging internal review since its formation has concluded that it would provide a better service to its customers as a Defence agency. It is therefore being launched on Wednesday 11 December as the Naval Bases and Supply Agency. NBSA will remain part of the MOD but the chief executive will have the necessary delegated powers to discharge his responsibilities.

Whilst the agency's main customer is the Commander-in-Chief Fleet, NBSA, as the provider of engineering and supply support, will work closely with the newly formed Ships Support Agency.

NBSA will be, in terms of staff, the largest Defence agency to launch, with some 13,350 staff, of which some 10,200 are civilian and 3,150 service. It will also be one of the more widespread, with sites from Devonport to the north of Scotland, including the three naval bases at Devonport, Portmouth and the Clyde, and a headquarters at Ensleigh, Bath.

NBSA has developed demanding targets and performance indicators in conjunction with its owner and customers. These are largely based on satisfying customer requirements, but also include measures to monitor and improve the quality, timeliness and efficiency of the agency's outputs. The key targets which have been agreed for the period up to March 1997 are:

(1) To complete 90 per cent. of vessel assisted maintenance periods to time, budget and standard by March 1997.

(2) To supply 90 per cent. of available material to rectify vessel operational defects within required delivery dates.

(3) To establish the NBSA cost per materially available vessel day by March 1997.

(4) To complete integration of the naval base management structures by April 1997, and to continue devolvement of tasks from HQ.

(5) To complete implementation of the DCS 10 infrastructure measures by March 1997.

(6) To implement the recommendations of the non-explosive warehousing review by March 1998—progress report in March 1997.

(7) To implement resource accounting and budgeting, including the provision of an executive information system to meet business requirements, by March 2000—progress report in March 1997.

(8) To establish the agency account by March 1998—progress report in March 1997.

(9) To achieve year-on-year efficiency improvements of 1.1 per cent. by March 1997.

(10) To achieve full accreditation of Investors in People by phased implementation.

All of these targets will encourage continuous improvements in NBSA services or efficiency.

WALES

Waiting Lists

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people have been waiting for an operation for more than a year in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [7235]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: At 30 September 1996, 5,303 people have been waiting more than a year to be admitted to hospital in Wales as an in-patient or day case. The number of these who were waiting for operations is not available centrally. However, it is estimated that, of the 253,000 in-patient and day cases in 1995–96 where an operation was performed and the waiting time recorded, 89,400—3 per cent.—had waited more than a year.

Beaches

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each year since 1991 those beaches in Wales which complied with the EU bathing water standard guide for (a) total and faecal coliforms, (b) faecal streptococci, and (c) coliforms and faecal streptococci combined. [7433]

Mr. Hague: The information requested has been placed in the Library of the House.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) he will list for each non-departmental agency for which he has responsibility (a) the date that it was set up and (b) the number of parliamentary questions which have been referred for answer to it in the 1994–95 parliamentary Session and in the 1995–96 Session to date; and if he will make a statement; [7465]

(2) how many parliamentary questions to his Department have been referred for answer to the chief executive or other senior official of a non-departmental agency for which he has responsibility in each of the last six parliamentary Sessions; and if he will make a statement. [7466]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 24 July 1996, Official Report, column 391. So far in the 1996–97 parliamentary Session, 13 parliamentary questions have been referred to chief executives of non-departmental public bodies—NDPBs. No questions have been referred to the following bodies, established in the year given for each of: Land Authority for Wales (1975); National Museum of Wales (1907); National Library of Wales (1907); Sports Council for Wales (1972); Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales (1994); Welsh National Board for Nursing, Health Visiting and Midwifery (1983); Royal Commission for Ancient and Historical Monuments in Wales (1908); Higher Education Funding Council (1992); Further Education Funding Council (1993); Wales Youth Agency (1992); and the Residuary Body for Wales (1995).

For each of the other executives NDPBs, establishment dates and the total number of parliamentary questions referred to them in the parliamentary Sessions 1994–95, 1995–96 and 1996–97, are as follows:

NDPB	Establishment date	Parliamentary Session 1994–95	1995–96	1996–97
Welsh Development Agency	1976	12	15	3
Development Board for Rural Wales	1977	6	2	0

Hospital Admissions

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of ordinary patient admissions by region in Wales in each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement. [7480]

Mr. Hague: The information is given in the table. Data relating to NHS trusts are included in the former district health authority area in which they were situated.

Number of ordinary admissions (in-patients and day cases) to NHS Hospitals in Wales

District health authority	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96

NHS Trusts

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many NHS trusts in Wales (a) hold public meetings, (b) conduct public consultation exercises, (c) conduct consultation exercises with outside commercial interests, (d) publish a register of members' interests, (e) publish agendas for meetings and (f) publish the minutes of meetings; if he will indicate if this is in each case (i) under a statutory requirement or (ii) on a voluntary basis; and if he will make a statement. [7484]

Mr. Hague: All NHS trusts are required to hold public meetings for the presentation of the annual report including audited accounts and otherwise as prescribed under the NHS Trusts (Public Meetings) Regulations 1991. NHS trusts are not required to publish agendas or minutes of meetings.

The code of conduct and accountability for NHS boards issued by my Department in January 1995 states that a register of relevant interests should be made available to the public.

Information on trusts' non-statutory practices is not held centrally but is generally set out in their annual reports, which are held in the Library.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 5 December, Official Report, column 752–53, on health trusts and authorities spending, if he will list for each health authority what changes have been made to the original revenue cash limits in the setting of the latest notified revenue cash limits. [8458]

Mr. Hague: Welsh health authorities have received the following changes to their initial revenue cash limits:

£000s

	Original cash limit	Latest notified cash limit
North Wales	342,095	373,586
Dyfed Powys	257,493	294,847
Morgannwg	257,808	299,945
Bro Taf	404,360	436,830
Gwent	280,322	304,698

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 5 December, Official Report, columns 752–53, if he will list the estimated outturn for each trust and health authority for the full financial year 1996–97. [8455]

Mr. Hague: The latest estimated outturn for each trust and health authority for the financial year 1996–97 is given in the tables. It should be noted that a number of trusts are involved in continuing contractual negotiations with their commissioners which could be expected to improve their end-year position. It should be noted that the position for health authorities relates to cash drawings at 31 March 1997; the position for NHS trusts is the estimated income and expenditure position.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 5 December, Official Report, columns 752–53, on health trusts and authorities spending, if he will list the principal steps he has asked those trusts in deficit to take to rectify their deficit. [8457]

Mr. Hague: Sound financial management, within the regulations of the trust financial regime, is the responsibility of the trust board. Trusts that have forecast a year-end deficient position, and which do not have sufficient reserves to meet this situation in-year, will be expected to devise a recovery plan. The plan should be formulated in conjunction with the trust's respective commissioners. Trusts are expected to return to a balanced position within an agreed time scale.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 5 December, Official Report, columns 752–53, on health trusts and authorities spending, if he will list the equivalent figures for each health authority and trust at (a) the end of the first quarter for 1996–97, (b) the end of the first quarter 1995–96 and (c) the end of the second quarter 1996–97. [8459]

Mr. Hague: The further information requested is provided in the following table:

Health Service Staff

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list by health authority in Wales the number of (a) doctors, (b) nurses, (c) midwives, (d) health visitors, (e) administration and clerical staff and (f) managers in (i) 1990, (ii) 1992, (iii) 1994 and (iv) 1995; and if he will make a statement; [7488]

(2) if he will list by health authority, trust or equivalent body the number of (a) doctors, (b) nurses, (c) midwives, (d) health visitors, (e) administration and clerical staff and (f) managers in Wales in (i) 1990, (ii) 1992 and (iii) 1994; and if he will make a statement. [7481]

Mr. Hague: The available information is given in the table. Information for nurses, midwives and health visitors is not available separately and, therefore, total nursing and midwifery staff is given.

Dental Services

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many NHS patients in Wales were registered with a dental practitioner in (a) April 1994, (b) April 1995 and (c) April 1996. [7490]

Mr. Hague: This information is as follows:

NHS patients in Wales registered with a dental practitioner

April 1994: 1,689,037

April 1995: 1,612,959

April 1996: 1,578,405

Asthma

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the mortality rates in respect of asthma in Wales for each of the last five years (a) among the whole population and (b) among under 16-year-olds; and if he will make a statement. [7483]

Mr. Hague: The information requested, provided by the Office for National Statistics, is in the table:

Asthma[1] deaths per million population; Welsh residents

	All ages	Under 16
1993	40	2
1995	34	2

[1] International Classification of Diseases, 9th revision, code 493. Figures for 1991 and 1992 represent the number of deaths registered in each year, while the figures for 1993 onwards represent the number of deaths which occurred in each year. Also, new procedures for coding cause of death from 1993, and the absence of medical inquiries, mean that figures for 1993 onwards may not be exactly comparable with earlier years.

General Practitioners' Premises

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information his Department collates on the condition of general practitioners' premises; and what grants and loans have been made available for the construction and maintenance of general practitioners' premises in the last five years, by year and by health authority area. [7970]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Health authorities in Wales are responsible for collating these data. Grants to GPs for the construction and improvement of practice premises form part of the general medical services cash-limited allocation, which is administered at the discretion of the health authority. The general medical services cash-limited allocation increased by £4 million in 1996–97 to £59.2 million—an increase in real terms of 7.36 per cent.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of multi-drug-resistant TB have been diagnosed in each of the last five years. [7968]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In Wales, in the past five years—to 4 December 1996—only two cases of tuberculosis with primary resistance to isoniazid and refampicin with or without resistance to other drugs have been diagnosed by the regional centre for mycobacteria at Cardiff public health laboratory, one in 1992 and one in 1995.

Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of housing association homes built in (a) 1992 and (b) 1995; and what is his estimate for 1996. [7765]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information on housing association homes built is in table 5.1 of "Welsh Housing Statistics 1996", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Housing for Wales's target of completions for 1996–97 is 3,500, which includes new build, acquisitions and low-cost home ownership schemes.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of housing association homes to be built in 1997–98; and if he will make a statement. [7766]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is not yet available.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he proposes to enable an adequate supply of homes for people on low incomes in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [7771]

Mr. Evans: Over the past five years, more than 21,000 affordable dwellings have been provided by housing associations. A further 2,000 low-cost homes for rent and purchase have been provided through our challenge fund initiatives. I will keep under review various indicators of housing demand.

PFI Schemes

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his Department's latest private finance initiative approved schemes. [8107]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 28 November 1996 to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), Official Report, column 403.

Employment Initiatives

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the initiatives taken to improve the employment prospects for young people in Wales during each of the last three years, with in each case the financial commitments involved; and if he will make a statement. [7266]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Good education and training and sound careers advice are fundamental to a young person's employment prospects. Our programme of action to raise, strengthen standards and widen choice and opportunity is set out in "People and Prosperity: an Agenda for Action in Wales" which was published on 20 March 1995, and in the bright future programme to raise performance in schools.

In the light of these strategies, a wide range of action is being taken locally by education authorities, schools and colleges. Welsh Office funding for the past three years for training and education support programmes that are specifically designed to help young people, and delivered through the training and enterprise councils and local career services, is set out in the table.

	1994–95 Outturn	1995–96 Outturn	1996–97 Planned expenditure
Training for young people—including modern apprenticeships
Accelerated modern apprenticeships and youth training youth credits[1]	39.408	43.201	53.008
Careers service	[2]n/a	13.911	12.336
TVEI	[3]4.963	—	—
Education business links	1.605	2.789	3.015
National record of achievement	0.118	0.141	0.157

[1] In addition, the Welsh Office has provided funding of £350,000, £150,000 and £500,000 in each of the last three years to TECs to support local initiatives to encourage disaffected young people to enter education, training or employment.

[2] Figures for the careers service are not available for 1994–95 as they were funded via LEAs.

[3] TVEI—technical and vocational education initiatives—came to an end in 1994–95.

Agri-environmental Schemes

Sir Jerry Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each of the agri-environmental schemes for which his Department is responsible, (i) actual expenditure in 1992–93, 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96, (ii) provision and estimated outturn of expenditure in 1996–97 and (iii) planned expenditure in 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, distinguishing in each case between (a) payments to farmers, (b) running costs and (c) monitoring costs. [8009]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information requested for 1992–93 to 1996–97 is set out in the table. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make a statement about future public expenditure in Wales shortly.

(c) Monitoring costs[2]	405	716	962	920	904

[1] Tir Cymen is operated by the Countryside Council for Wales.

[2] Information on running and monitoring costs for each individual scheme is not available.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8547]

Mr. Hague: The Welsh Office maintains its own register of people who are willing to be considered for appointment to public bodies in Wales and from time to time advertises for candidates.

Blood Stocks

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultation he has had with the chairman of the university hospital of Wales concerning the levels of blood transfusion stocks; and what assessment he has made of the impact which blood stock levels have had on non-emergency operations in the last 12 months. [8456]

Mr. Hague: None. Blood stock levels are a matter for the national Blood Transfusion Service (Wales) in discussion with the NHS trusts concerned.

SOCIAL SECURITY

State Pensions

12. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received in favour of allowing people to claim a state pension from 60 years of age; and if he will make a statement. [6856]

15. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the additional cost of paying a full state pension from 60 years. [6859]

16. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has for the state retirement pension; and if he will make a statement. [6860]

26. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the current old-age pension provision. [6870]

Mr. Lilley: I have recently received only one representation in favour of allowing people to claim the state pension from age 60—from the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman). To reduce the minimum age for claiming state pension to age 60 without increasing the burden on the taxpayer would mean that a single person would have a cut in their basic pension of £20 a week for the rest of their life.

13. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change the method of payment of the state pension. [6857]

Mr. Heald: We are introducing a benefit payment card for those who wish to continue to receive their pensions and benefits at the Post Office. The change has started successfully with child benefit. We intend to test the system thoroughly before paying further benefits, including retirement pensions, by card. People who choose to have their pensions paid into a bank or building society will not be affected by this change.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the changes he has made in his policy towards the basic retirement pension in the current Parliament; and if he will make a statement. [6846]

Mr. Heald: In the 1995 Pensions Act we brought forward the following changes in the basic state retirement pension:

from 6 April 2010, over a period of 10 years the state pension age for women will gradually rise from age 60 to 65; from 2010 both men and women will be able to defer claiming their pension indefinitely. The incremental rate will rise from 7.5 per cent. to 10.4 per cent. a year; from 2010 the rules relating to derived rights pensions will be equalised so that both men and women will be able to claim category B retirement pension based on the contribution record of their spouse if their own record is insufficient for a category A retirement pension; and from 2010 the rules for the award of adult dependency increases (ADI) will be simplified so that either a man or a woman of state pension age will be able to claim on ADI in respect of the younger spouse provided he or she does not have earnings, entitlement to another personal NI benefit or an occupational or personal pension which is more than the standard rate of unemployment benefit.

Benefit Payments (Non-UK Nationals)

14. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on his Department's policy for issuing benefit payments to non-UK nationals. [6858]

Mr. Roger Evans: We have introduced significant changes to the Social Security regulations to narrow the access non-UK nationals have to the benefit system. The habitual residence test has dramatically reduced the number of awards of income support, jobseeker's allowance, housing benefit and council tax benefit claims to European non-UK nationals.

People from outside Europe are subject to immigration controls. Those whose right to reside or remain in Great Britain is subject to any limitation or condition cannot become a charge upon public funds. Regulations have been introduced that extend the list of benefits not available to this group to include all the non-contributory benefits, and restrict the benefit entitlement of asylum seekers.

Income-related Benefits

17. Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the increase in social security expenditure on income-related benefits in real terms since 1979. [6861]

Mr. Burt: Income-related benefit expenditure rose from £8 billion in 1978–79 to £31.5 billion in 1995–96.

Although the number of people on income support has remained steady over the last four years, unemployment has fallen by over 950,000 since December 1992 and is still on a downward trend. This fall has been offset by increases in the number of pensioners, lone parents and people with disabilities claiming income support.

One-parent Families

18. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement concerning poverty in one-parent families. [6862]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: No Government have agreed on a simple or meaningful way to define poverty.

Many lone parents are less well off because they do not work. The Government have substantially enhanced in-work benefits to help them improve their living standards. Over 200,000 lone parents have moved into work supported by family credit since 1992, and from April 1997 the new parent plus scheme will pilot ways of helping up to 100,000 lone parents into work.

Incapacity Benefit

19. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the operation of the all work test for incapacity benefit. [6863]

Mr. Burt: We have received a number of representations from hon. Members and members of the public.

During the development of the test the Department consulted widely and took account of the responses in designing the all work test and associate procedures.

Housing Benefit Fraud

20. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action his Department his taking to combat housing benefit fraud by landlords. [6864]

Mr. Heald: We have in place a comprehensive strategy for combating all housing benefit fraud, including landlord fraud. For example, this year we have provided £1 million in start-up funding for a pilot local authority team to tackle organised fraud across London borough boundaries. We propose to take further powers to detect and punish fraudsters, including fraudulent landlords, in the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Bill, now in Committee.

24. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what rewards and penalties he plans to give local authorities to encourage them to reduce housing benefit fraud. [6868]

Mr. Roger Evans: Each local authority is set a threshold of weekly benefit savings to be made through the detection of housing benefit and council tax benefit fraud. Local authorities can earn additional subsidy through performance in relation to their weekly benefit savings thresholds, and can have subsidy withheld for poor performance.

We are currently consulting the local authority associations on the proposed arrangements for 1997–98.

The Social Security Administration (Fraud) Bill contains proposals to strengthen my right hon. Friend's powers to increase subsidy to encourage local authorities to combat fraud and clarifies his existing broad powers to reduce subsidy.

Child Support Agency

21. Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received about the Child Support Agency. [6865]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: We regularly receive representations from a wide variety of sources. While many continue to involve cases in which the standard of service is still not as good as we would like, they reveal a growing acceptance that child support is a permanent feature of British life and that the agency is showing continuing improvements in performance.

Lone Parents

23. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of lone parents on (a) income support in the United Kingdom and (b) on comparable benefits in other EU countries. [6867]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: At the end of November 1995 there were 1,095,000 income support recipients in the United Kingdom receiving the lone parent premium. Social assistance benefits in other EU countries are not strictly comparable with income support: countries such as Greece, Portugal and Italy have very limited schemes; some schemes are local, others national; and most other countries require lone parents to be available for work even when they have children of school age.

Notes:

1. The figure has been rounded to the nearest thousand.

2. The figure given is the number of income support recipients who receive the lone-parent premium. This excludes some one parent families who receive a higher-value premium by reason of age and/or disability.

Housing Benefit

25. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the expenditure on housing benefit in (a) 1985–86 and (b) 1995–96; and what was the real terms change over that period. [6896]

Mr. Roger Evans: In 1995–96 prices, expenditure on housing benefit was £5,054 billion for 1985–86 and £10.848 billion for 1995–96. The real terms increase over the period was just under 115 per cent. Overall Government subsidies to housing during the 1990s have remained more or less stable in real terms.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the planned restrictions on housing benefit payments to private deregulated tenants will apply to tenants of properties managed under the housing associations as management agents scheme. [7243]

Mr. Roger Evans: Yes. However, claimants exempted from the local reference rent and single room rent rules would not be affected by the proposed restrictions.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consultations his Department had with representatives of private landlords prior to his announcement of proposed restrictions on housing benefit payments to tenants of private deregulated properties. [7244]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Government receive from time to time representations on all aspects of Social Security matters. The recent announcement of the proposed changes to restrict housing benefit has been referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee for its consideration. These proposed changes will also be the subject of consultation with the local authority associations. Representatives of private landlords, as well as others with an interest in these proposals will have ample opportunity to make their views known. The Government will consider carefully all representations before taking final decisions.

Reduced Earnings Allowances

27. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the amounts saved by the withdrawal of the reduced earnings allowances; and how many people have lost their allowances. [6871]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I have him on 14 October, Official Report, column 775 and to the answer I gave to the hon. member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 12 November, Official Report, column 195.

28. Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the additional cost to public funds of linking pensions to earnings since 1980. [6872]

29. Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received in respect of uprating pensions in line with prices rather than earnings. [6873]

Mr Heald: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Rydale (Mr. Greenway).

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to reimburse local authorities for additional costs incurred as a result of changes to regulations concerning asylum seekers. [6866]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Government intend, subject to parliamentary approval, to make funds available through a special grant to meet reasonable costs incurred by local authorities who are supporting asylum seekers under the National Assistance Act 1948.

Regulations

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many regulations he referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee in (a) 1993–94, (b) 1994–95, (c) 1995–96 and (d) 1996 to date; and in how many of these references he followed the committee's recommendations in full. [6725]

Mr. Burt: When the Social Security Advisory Committee exercises its powers under the Social Security Administration Act 1992 to have proposals for regulations formally referred, its report is published as a command paper, which includes the Secretary of State's response to the committee's recommendations. Copies of the reports are available in the Library. Since April 1993 reports have been published on the following regulations:

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many recipients of (a) incapacity benefit, (b) severe disablement allowance and (c) invalid care allowance have earnings from employment; how many claimants of (i) incapacity benefit, (ii) severe disablement allowance, (iii) invalid care allowance, (iv) maternity allowance and (v) retirement pension receive increases for adult dependants where the dependant only has earnings; and in how many cases both claimant and partner have earnings. [6727]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Details of the earnings of claimants and their partners is collected only when this has direct relevance to the entitlement conditions of the benefit being claimed.

	Number
Invalid care allowance recipients receiving earnings from employment at 18 November 1996	[1]26,497
Incapacity benefit cases where Adult Dependency Increase (ADI) reduced because of earnings of adult dependant	[2]920
Incapacity benefit cases where ADI extinguished because of earnings of adult dependant	[2]8,000
Severe disablement allowance cases where ADI reduced because of earnings of adult dependant	[2]20
Severe disablement allowance cases where ADI extinguished because of earnings of adult dependant	[2]140

[1] 100 per cent. count of cases.
[2] 5 per cent. sample of the incapacity benefit computer system. Excludes a small number of cases not on the system. Subject to sampling error due to small number of cases.
Figures are at 31 May 1996 unless otherwise stated.

Mortgage Interest Payments

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of (a) the cost and (b) the numbers gaining if entitlement to mortgage interest payments as currently payable with income support were extended to (i) family credit and (ii) disability working allowance. [6731]

Mr. Roger Evans: The cost of extending help with mortgage interest payments would be £1.1 billion in family credit and £17 million in disability working allowance.

The measure would help 515,000 people in family credit and 5,000 in disability working allowance including people who would become newly entitled as a result.

Notes:

1. It is not possible to estimate the effect of the October 1995 income support mortgage interest changes which introduced new waiting periods and the standard interest rate for calculating help.
2. Data have been modelled on the 1994–95 family resources survey (FRS), uprated to 1996–97 price and benefit levels.
3. Amounts have been rounded to the nearest £100 million in family credit and £1 million in disability working allowance.
4. Caseloads have been rounded to the nearest 5,000 in family credit and 1,000 in disability working allowance.
5. The number of people becoming newly entitles to benefit is estimated at 265,000 in family credit and 3,000 in disability working allowance.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the savings which will accrue to his Department as a result of the Social Security (Disability Living Allowance and Claims and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1996 (S.I. 1996 No. 1436); and if he will make a statement. [7039]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Savings are estimated to be in the region of between £40 and £45 million for 1997–98 and 1998–99. Actual savings are kept under review and revised as necessary as new data become available.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average cost of dealing with an application for disability living allowance which goes to (a) review and (b) appeal. [6737]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mrs. Alice Mahon, dated 9 December 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what is the average cost of dealing with an application for Disability Living Allowance (DLA) which to (a) review and (b) appeal.

The following information reflects the average operational staffing costs involved in the processing of both reviews and appeals relating to DLA.

Cost of processing a DLA claim: £50[1]

Cost of processing a Review for DLA: £22

Cost of processing an appeal for DLA: £59[2]

[1] This figure incorporates the new measures for administrative tightening.

[3] The above figures reflect the cost of processing to the implementation of a decision. Costs relating to the arrangement of Disability Appeals Tribunal (DAT) hearings is held by the Independent Tribunal Service. The average cost of an appeal session, from April to October 1996, for DLA is £343 with on average, 3.37 cases heard per session. This figure reflects the cost for the appellant and the DAT members only.

The costs are rounded to the nearest pound.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

EU Payroll Costs

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those countries in Europe where social, welfare or pension charges on the payroll costs of employers have been changed following the imposition of a directive from the European Union. [7013]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available.

Compensation Recovery Scheme

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes he is proposing to introduce to the compensation recovery scheme; when the changes will be introduced; and if repayments will be made to those people who have already paid. [7987]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchcliffe) on 7 November, Official Report, columns 681-82.

Disability Discrimination Act

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department will monitor the car insurance industry, following the implementation of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, to ascertain whether insurers charge higher premiums on vehicles that have been modified for the disabled. [7808]

Mr. Burt: The Government will monitor the Disability Discrimination Act in order to assess its effectiveness in combatting discrimination. The National Disability Council will also provide advice to the Government on matters relevant to the elimination of discrimination and the operation of the Act.

CSA Chief Executive

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what date he was informed that the chief executive of the Child Support Agency intended to take up her new post with Business in the Community. [8110]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, has known since February 1996 that Miss Chant would not be undertaking a further extension of her contract beyond March 1997.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans there are to give preference to non-civil service candidates in filling the post of chief executive of the Child Support Agency. [8112]

Mr. Mitchell: None. All candidates will be treated equally.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans there are to advertise the post of chief executive of the Child Support Agency (a) within the civil service and (b) outside it. [8111]

Mr. Mitchell: Permanent secretaries in other Government Departments have been asked to circulate details of the post to prospective candidates;

The post was also advertised in the national press on 8 December 1996 and will be again on 12 December 1996. Executive search is also being carried out on the Department's behalf by recruitment consultants.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what initial period of contract will be offered to the next chief executive of the Child Support Agency. [8113]

Mr. Mitchell: Five years.

Changes

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list each social security change since 1979 and for each the net gain or loss to public expenditure (a) for each year since the change took effect and (b) cumulatively for each change to date; and what has been the net change to public expenditure totals of the changes to date. [8128]

Mr. Burt: The main developments in Social Security since the second world war—together with details of expenditure by benefit since 1979—are set out in "The Growth of Social Security", which was published in 1993.

Further information is provided in public expenditure White Papers from 1979 to 1990 and—from 1991 to date—departmental reports of the Department of Social Security. Copies of all documents are in the Library.

Housebuilding Industry

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consultations he undertook with the housebuilding industry prior to the publication of the booklet entitled, "Are Your Workers Employed or Self-Employed"; what representations he has received from housebuilders since the publication of that booklet; and if he will make a statement. [8553]

Mr. Heald: A wide range of representative bodies from the construction industry, including the housebuilding industry, were involved in joint consultations with officials from the Department and the Inland Revenue before the publication of the booklet.

Since October 1995 we have had numerous representations and meetings at official and ministerial level from the industry. Details of the help provided for the construction industry on employment status are set out in a joint Inland Revenue and Contributions Agency press release issued on 19 November 1996, copies of which are available in the Library.

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to consult (a) the Housebuilders Federation, (b) the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance and (c) other bodies representing the interests of housebuilders and their workers, before making any changes to the convention that construction operatives in the housebuilding sector are considered as self-employed for national insurance purposes. [8556]

Mr. Heald: We have already developed contacts with a wide range of representatives bodies from the construction industry, including groups representing members of the housebuilding industry. We will continue to work closely with these contacts on the issue of employment status in the industry.

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the costs for employers in the housebuilding sector of the recent ending of self-employed status for construction operatives, in terms of (a) employers' national insurance, (b) employees' national insurance, (c) other taxes; and (d) administrative and payroll costs. [8554]

Mr. Heald: It is incorrect to say that self-employed status has been ended for construction workers. As in other industries, contractors will continue to be free to take on workers as self-employed where the terms and conditions of engagement reflect genuine self-employment.

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for how many years construction operatives in the housebuilding sector have been considered to be self-employed for national insurance purposes; when, by whom and for what reasons the decision was taken to change that status; and if he will make a statement. [8555]

Mr. Heald: Since 1980, the administrative practice of the Department has been to accept that the issue by the Inland Revenue of a 714 certificate or deduction from payments under the SC60 scheme were evidence of self employment. Following representations from the construction industry claiming that many workers treated as self-employed were really employees, the Inland Revenue and Department of Social Security prepared new guidance for the industry about employment status. This made it clear that whether someone is employed or self-employed depends on the terms of engagement not the issue of a 714 certificate.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8539]

Mr. Burt: None. The public appointments unit is routinely consulted when public appointments are made to this Department's public bodies. Many of the public bodies are of a specialist nature, and the appointees are drawn from a specialist field. When the PAU is consulted, any names given may duplicate those from other sources.

Child Support

Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures are planned to assist applicants under the proposed departure directions procedure in obtaining evidence to support allegations of inconsistent lifestyle. [8124]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ann Chant to Mr. Malcolm Wicks, dated 9 December 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about applications for a departure from the maintenance formula on the grounds that a parent's lifestyle is inconsistent with the income on which their maintenance assessment is based.

You asked what measures are planned to assist applicants in gathering evidence to support their application for a departure direction on this ground. While the departures scheme places the onus on the applicant to justify the validity of their application, it is recognised that in such cases, conclusive written evidence will not always be available. Providing there is some indication of a genuine case to consider, it is intended that the decision on the application will be based on a balanced view of all the evidence, even when not supported by documentary evidence.

It may be helpful if I outline how applications on this ground will be dealt with. The Agency will first establish that the application is valid and that there is some indication that the parent's overall lifestyle is substantially inconsistent with the level of income on which the maintenance assessment is based. Cases will be refused at this stage if it appears that there is no likelihood of the application succeeding, for example, if the applicant states only that the other parent goes abroad for a holiday or has a better lifestyle than their own. If the application is refused at this point, the parent making the application will have a right of appeal.

Cases that are not refused will be referred to a Child Support Appeal Tribunal for a decision. It will be for the Tribunal to decide what evidence it needs and how to balance the information provided by both parents in reaching its decision. There are also powers to hold "direction hearings" in advance of the Tribunal. These provide the Chairman with the opportunity to direct either parent to provide any further evidence considered necessary.

I hope this explanation reassures you that, whilst some reasonable degree of responsibility must rest with the applicant to justify their application, it is accepted that they will not always be in a position to provide full supporting documentary evidence; and that failure to do so will not automatically result in the application being refused. A balance must be struck however, to prevent vexatious or malicious applications from getting into the system.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of child support cases involving self-employed absent parents concerned parents with care who were claiming income support, family credit or disability working allowance. [8123]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ann Chant to Mr. Malcolm Wicks, dated 9 December 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support Agency self employed cases.

There are currently around 20,000 self employed absent parents cases, live on Child Support Computer System, with a full maintenance assessment. The benefit status of the associated parents with care is not, however, currently available.

I hope this is helpful.

TREASURY

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Bank of England is taking to ensure the single currency compliancy of its computer systems, and those with which they are connected; what is its budget for this purpose; and if he will make a statement. [6661]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Bank of England's computer systems will be affected by the introduction of the euro whether or not the United Kingdom adopts the single currency. Work to assess the implications and to ensure preparedness started some time ago. The bank is also liaising with the Association for Payment Clearing Services, which oversees the banking payments systems, and with the commercial banks. No separate budget has yet been set for this process.

Tax Law Rewrite

Mr. Forman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Inland Revenue will publish the document giving the plans and arrangements for the tax law rewrite, referred to in his 1996 Budget statement. [8931]

Mr. Jack: I am very pleased to be able to report on the good progress that has been made on the tax law rewrite. The Inland Revenue has today published a document which sets out the response to its consultations on this project to rewrite tax law in clearer and simpler language. I am placing copies in the Libraries of the House.

This document takes full account of the comments received. It sets out the resulting plans and arrangements for taking the rewrite forward, so that the first rewrite Bill will be ready for enactment in the 1997–98 parliamentary Session.

This is a very important and worthwhile project which will bring the benefits of clarity and certainty to businesses and ordinary taxpayers alike. We are committed to proceeding with it on the basis of full consultation.

Mr. Forman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer who will be the members of the tax law rewrite steering committee being chaired by the right hon. the Lord Howe of Aberavon CH, QC. [8932]

Mr. Jack: The steering committee will play a crucial role in the rewrite project. Under the chairmanship of the right hon. the Lord Howe of Aberavon CH, QC, the committee will guide the project through the challenges that lie ahead, while ensuring that it keeps to its objectives.

The committee combines the talents and experience of a wide range of members drawn from Parliament, the legal and accountancy professions, consumer interests and the private sector.

I am delighted to announce today that the other members of the committee will be the right hon. Sir John Balcombe, Mr. Ian Barlow, Dr. John Avery Jones CBE, Mr. Steve Matheson CB, Dr. John Marek MP, Ms Sheila McKechnie OBE, Sir John Shaw and Mr. Tim Smith MP. I am sure that this important project will benefit greatly from their experience.

Taxation

Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his answer to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) of 26 February, Official Report, columns 339–52, to take account of (a) changes made in the Budget, and to provide his latest estimates of the burden of direct and indirect taxes for 1997–98, (b) revisions to figures for earlier years and (c) separate figures for (i) VAT, (ii) other indirect taxes and (iii) the council tax. [5195]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 27 November 1996]: The tables show estimates of tax payments for the requested specimen households for the years 1994–95 to 1997–98.

The main factors accounting for the increase in payments between years are growth in earnings and inflation. The figures for tax payments do not measure the effects of changes in tax rates, allowances, etcetera. A one-earner couple on average earnings with two children will pay £88 less in income tax and national insurance contributions next year than if these taxes had been left unchanged since 1991–92, apart from indexation.

Real take-home pay for all these households will rise next year and will be substantially higher than in 1991–92. For the family on average earnings, the increase next year will be £370, bringing the total rise since 1991–92 to over £1,100. These increases take account of all taxes as well as earnings growth and inflation. Other factors are also boosting living standards, such as the lowest mortgage rates for 30 years and the rise in employment by ¾ million since 1992.

The figures for tax payments are subject to important limitations. The estimates of indirect tax payments are very approximate. They are based on the assumption that these taxes are fully passed on in prices, which may not hold in practice. They also assume particular spending patterns by the households whereas in practice there are wide variations in spending on taxed goods, and hence in indirect tax payments, between households with similar incomes and compositions. Nor do the estimates include the effects of changes in tax on savings, particularly the reduction in the tax rate on savings income to 20 per cent. for basic rate payers or the growth in tax-free tax-exempt special savings accounts and personal equity plans, as the households specified have income only from earnings. The overall tax burden—total taxes and national insurance contributions as a percent of GDP—which includes the impact of all taxes is expected to be at the same level next year as in 1991–92.

Notes to Tables:

1. Income tax payments are calculated on the assumption that the households receive no tax reliefs other than the standard allowances and only have income from employment. All earner, including wives are assumed to pay Class 1 National Insurance contributions at the contracted-in rate. Child benefit is deducted from income tax so as to provide comparability with figures for earlier years when support was partly given through child tax allowances.
2. Earnings are taken to be the average gross weekly earnings of all full-time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. Estimates of earnings in 1996–97 and 1997–98 are based on earnings growth assumptions of 3¼ per cent. in 1996–97 and 4 per cent. in 1997–98 on line with the illustrative assumptions set out in the Financial Statement and Budget Report.
3. The figures for an indexed 1991–92 tax system show the tax payments that would result if the 1991–92 income tax system had been indexed to 1997–98 using the increase in the Retail Prices Index between December 1990 and September 1996, and income tax and national insurance contributions rates had been kept at their 1991–92 levels.
4. Real take-home pay includes earnings and child benefit less direct tax payments (income tax and national insurance contributions) deflated to 1996–97 prices using the Retail Prices Index. Indirect taxes and council tax are included in the Retail Prices Index and therefore in the inflation adjustment. Those on low earnings may be entitled to income-related benefits not included in these calculations.
5. Figures for indirect taxes include estimates of the effects of the main intermediate taxes on households as well as the impact of taxes on final goods and services. Estimates of the impact of taxes on final goods and services assume that these taxes are fully incident on households. Estimates of the impact of intermediate taxes are based on the relation between intermediate production costs and final consumption derived using input-output techniques.
6. Figures for indirect taxes and council tax are estimated from expenditure patterns in the 1994–95 Family Expenditure Survey uprated to later years using forecasts of aggregate tax receipts. All estimates are based on the illustrative assumption that 10 per cent. of disposable income is saved.
7. Estimates of indirect taxes are very approximate, even within the range for which figures are shown, because spending patterns vary widely between households with the same composition and income. The margin of error is even higher outside the range shown, and even illustrative estimates cannot be made. Because of sampling variation, there can be substantial differences between estimates obtained from Family Expenditure Surveys for different years, so reliable comparisons cannot be made between the estimates for different years.

Beer Taxes

Mr. Meale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was (a) the level of tax on beer in each year since 1979 and (b) the percentage change between each year. [7254]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 3 December 1996]: Tax revenues—excise duty and VAT—for a pint of bitter in licensed premises were as follows:

	Tax in pence	Percentage change
1979	12.2	23.1
1980	14.8	21.7
1981	19.3	29.7
1982	21.7	12.9
1983	23.1	6.1
1984	26.2	13.6
1985	28.3	8.0
1986	28.8	1.8
1987	29.2	1.4
1988	30.8	5.4
1989	31.6	2.5
1990	34.5	9.3
1991	40.6	17.8
1992	43.1	6.0
1993	45.2	4.9
1994	44.5	–1.5
1995	46.2	3.9
1996	46.9	1.6

For 1979, price relates to July. For 1980 to 1993 prices relate to April/May and from 1994 onwards they relate to January.

Tax on a pint of bitter in licensed premises is now the lowest proportion of the selling price in 30 years.

European Union Budget

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the net EU budget contributions for each member state in 1995 and their estimated contributions in 1996, indicating the sources of his figures. [7677]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 5 December 1996]: The table sets out indicative figures for 1995. These are drawn from the European Court of Auditors' information on member states' total financial contributions to and receipts from the Community budget published this November in the "Annual Report covering the financial year 1995". The net contribution figures show the balance from the two sides of the budget by deducting total receipts from the gross contribution for each member state. A minus sign therefore indicates that a member state received more from the budget in 1995 than it paid.

Comparable information from the European Court of Auditors relating to 1996 will not be available until November 1997. The figure for the UK's net contribution for 1996 is therefore the Treasury's most recent forecast. This calculation is not directly comparable with that of the European Court of Auditors, but the Government are confident that the UK's net contribution in 1996 will be considerably lower than in 1995 as we recover excess payments relating to the 1995 underspend.

Sweden	937	767
UK (1995)	4,720	3,865
UK (1996)	1,892	1,603

Notes:

1. These figures are net of the UK's abatement.
2. Exchange rates used are 1.2211 ecu/£ for 1995 and 1.1803 ecu/£ for 1996.
3. These figures can only be indicative of net contributions because the Court of Auditors does not allocate all Community spending by member state. In particular, administrative spending is not fully attributed.
4. Net contributions can vary significantly from year to year owing to adjustments in Own Resource payments and fluctuations in receipts. The UK's net contribution in 1995 was high because the Community Budget underspent in that year, leading to lower UK receipts than expected. The UK abatement in 1995 was also relatively lower than on average.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department will spend on Christmas trees and decorations this year; how many Christmas trees will be bought for his Department's headquarters; and what are the type and country of origin of the trees. [7572]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Two Christmas trees of type Nordmanianna, grown in England, have been purchased at a cost of around £500.

Economic Statistics

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his answer of 9 June 1995, Official Report, columns 339–40, on economic statistics relating to exports, investments, imports and gross domestic product of EU and G7 countries, to cover the period 1979 to 1995. [7820]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 6 December 1996]: G7 and EC growth, investment, exports and imports data can be found in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development publications "OECD Quarterly National Accounts" and the "OECD National Accounts, Vol. I", which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Household Incomes

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average gross weekly income in 1995–96 by decile group for (a) all households, (b) one adult retired households mainly dependent on state pensions, (c) one adult retired households not mainly dependent on state pensions, (d) one adult non-retired households, (e) one adult households with children, (f) two adult households with children, (g) one man, one woman non-retired households, (h) one man, one woman retired households mainly dependent on state pensions and (i) one man, one woman retired households not mainly dependent on state pensions. [7826]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Alan Milburn, dated 11 December 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on the average gross weekly income in 1995–96 by decile group for certain household compositions.

Estimates from the Family Expenditure Survey (FES) for average gross normal weekly income in 1995–96 by decile group for these household compositions are shown in the attached table. The figures are subject to sampling variations; have been rounded to the nearest 10 pence; are averages for each household composition and have not been adjusted to reflect household composition.

Budget Effects

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish his Department's estimates of the distributional impact of changes made in the Budget (a) by household income decile and (b) by region. [7267]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 10 December 1996]: Estimates of the impact of some of the main Budget tax measures on household income deciles are in the table. Estimates of the effects of other Budget measures and of the distributional impact by region are not available.

The figures show the direct impact of the measures on households. They do not allow for the lasting prosperity, combining steady growth with low inflation, that has been secured by the Budget and is ensuring that living standards go on rising. A family on average earnings should be £370 better off next year than this, after earnings growth, tax and inflation, and over £1,100 a year better off than in 1991–92.

[1] Estimates based on 1992–93 to 1994–95 Family Expenditure Survey data, uprated to 1997–98 price and earnings levels. Because of the limitations of the Survey data the estimates are only approximate, particularly at the top and bottom of the distribution. The figures include the main tax measures directly affecting households—real rises of £200 in personal allowances; real rise of £100 in lower rate band; 1p reduction in the basic rate of income tax; freeze on beer, wine and cider duties; 4 per cent. cut in spirits duty; 5 per cent. real rise in tobacco duty; 3 per cent. real rise in road fuel duties and the increase in insurance premium tax of 1.5 per cent. The figures show the effects relative to indexed tax allowances and duty rates.

Tax Evasion

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many cases of evasions of payments of (a) income tax and (b) other tax have been discovered in each of the last five years; and what has been the value of the revenue recovered in each category. [8306]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 10 December 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer which I gave him on 26 October 1995, Official Report, columns 727–28, which covered the years 1989–90 to 1994–95.

The equivalent figures for 1995–96 are:

Income tax investigations	Other investigations	Yield from counter-evasion work (£ million)
57,211	9,106	1,309

Splitting the yield figures for each of the last five years between income tax and other taxes could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Tax (Tobacco Products)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many representations he has received from members of the public calling for (a) maintaining present and (b) reducting rates of tax on tobacco products (i) since November 1995 and (ii) since September 1996; [6898]

(2) how many representations he has received from hon. Members calling for (a) maintaining present and (b) reducting rates of tax on tobacco products since November 1995. [6920]

Mr. Oppenheim: The precise information is not available, but the Prime Minister and Treasury Ministers have received many representations, in varying forms, from hon. Members, members of the public and health practitioners on many aspects of tobacco taxation. The Chancellor met hon. Members on 29 October, as did I on 30 October, to hear further representations on the subject of tobacco taxation.

Airport Passenger Taxes

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the level of airport passenger taxes, where appropriate, in each of the OECD member states. [7450]

Mr. Oppenheim: The information is not available in the form requested because the structure of air passenger taxes throughout OECD member states is very varied and complex. It includes embarkation taxes, departure charges, passenger service charges and air transport taxes as well as VAT-type taxes. They also vary, within a single state, according to factors such as airport of departure, place of destination, ticket price and weight of aircraft.

Prawns

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the verdict of the European Court on the duty liability of John and Celia Smith of Grimsby on prawns imported from the Faroe Islands with valid EUR 1 certificates, if he proposes to apply to the European Commission for a waiver on the duty. [7684]

Mr. Oppenheim: The European Court of Justice has referred this matter back to the United Kingdom High Court for a decision as to duty liability. The judgment specifically stated that it is now for the national court to determine whether the conditions for waiver are met. It is the High Court which will decide this case, not the European Commission.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount of retrospective duty was levied on German and Danish importers of prawns subsequently imported with valid EUR 1 certificates from Iceland and the Faroe Islands; and how many importers were affected. [7682]

Mr. Oppenheim: We have no information on amounts of duty demanded retrospectively in Germany and Denmark, or on the number of importers affected. However UK customs is aware that demands have been issued in both countries and, as in the United Kingdom, appeals are working their way through the respectively legal systems.

Zaire

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the allegations contained in the Cook report of June 1995 relating to arms transport to Zaire, a transcript of which has been sent to him. [7525]

Mr. Oppenheim: The investigation and prosecution of any alleged breaches of UK legislation implementing arms embargoes is a matter for the commissioners of Customs and Excise. It is not customs' general practice to comment publicly about the existence or nature of any investigation of individuals or companies not yet accused of criminal offences since to do so could risk prejudicing any on-going inquiries or future criminal proceedings.

I am, however, on this occasion able to tell the hon. Member that the allegations contained in the Cook report were taken into account in inquiries made by customs in 1995. These inquiries did not produce evidence to support any criminal proceedings.

British Artists (Germany)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy that British artists appearing in Germany should be able to recover or obtain credit for value added tax imposed in Germany on taxes withheld. [7660]

Mr. Oppenheim: When UK artists appear in Germany an element for VAT is included in the calculation of taxes withheld there. A deduction in respect of that element may be made by UK artists in computing their income for the purposes of UK income tax.

Petrol and Diesel

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of total income to the Treasury resulting from an increase in petrol and diesel duties exclusive of value added tax of (a) 1p per litre, (b) 3p per litre and (c) 4.5p per litre. [7479]

Mr. Oppenheim: Based on information in the "Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs," increasing the duty rate on petrol and diesel by 1p, 3p and 4.5p per litre would yield approximately £0.5 billion, £1.4 billion and £2.1 billion respectively in the first full year. Costings take account of the effects on behaviour where they are likely to have a significant effect on the yield and any consequential changes in receipts from related taxes including VAT; and they are measured against a non-indexed base.

National Insurance

Ms Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each source of taxation revenue and for national insurance, (i) the amounts received and what percentage that is of total revenue and (ii) the numbers of people paying in (a) 1980, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) 1995. [3044]

Mr. Jack [pursuant to his reply, 9 December 1996, c. 27–28]: There was a transcription error in the tables. I apologise for this mistake. The correct figures are given in the following tables.

Information on the amounts of tax received is in table 1. Figures for the numbers of people paying income tax, corporation tax, capital gains tax and inheritance tax are in table 2. Information on the numbers of people paying other taxes is not available.

Private Finance Initiative (Universities)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many universities have made use of the private finance initiative to date; and what is the total expenditure involved. [8425]

Mr. Forth: I have been asked to reply.

The Higher Education Funding Council for England has an active programme for seeking private finance initiative "pathfinder" projects which can be used as exemplars of good practice for the sector as a whole. So far, 12 institutions have been awarded this status and are progressing projects to a capital value of some £120 million. The funding council has recently closed round two of its "pathfinder" programme, and we expect announcements regarding additional successful projects early in the new year.

Universities are autonomous institutions and make their own procurement decisions. It is therefore impossible to know the exact number of institutions which have procurement arrangements involving private finance. The Higher Education Funding Council for England estimates that total commercial funding in the sector to date exceeds £1.6 billion.

ENVIRONMENT

Departmental Staff (Local Government)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many personnel in his Department work full time on local government matters; at what cost; and if he will make a statement. [7773]

Sir Paul Beresford: In the Department of the Environment, approximately 222 staff work full time on local government matters at a total administration cost of approximately £8.5 million.

Leader Project

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the Leader project; how much funding from European Community resources is available for the United Kingdom, and in which financial years; to what extent matching funding from Her Majesty's Government are required; and which areas of England qualified to receive Leader funding. [8066]

Sir Paul Beresford: The purpose of the Leader II initiative is to permit those engaged in the rural economy to implement measures which will help develop their own potential within an overall policy for stimulating rural development.

The United Kingdom has been allocated £62.64 million up to the end of 1999. Leader II will pay up to 50 per cent. of the eligible costs of a project. The remaining match funding must be found by the applicant, and may come from the Government and other public and private sector sources. The initiative is targeted at objective 5b areas and those eligible in England are parts of the northern uplands, midlands uplands, Lincolnshire, East Anglia, the south-west and the west midlands marches.

Stockton City Challenge

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what decision he has reached on the application by Stockton city challenge to redevelop the north end of Stockton high street. [8069]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Secretary of State received the report of the inspector who conducted the public inquiry on 3 June 1996, and is considering it. Following receipt of the report, he was asked to reopen the public inquiry by one of the non-statutory objectors to the compulsory purchase order, and this required some further consultation with the parties involved in the inquiry. Those consultations are now complete and are also being considered. The decision will be issued as soon as it is practicable to do so.

Rooms over Shops

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress with the Government's scheme to encourage shopkeepers to use rooms over the shop for private tenancies; what financial incentives are available; and how many units are estimated to have become available since the scheme began. [8067]

Mr. Clappison: My Department ran a demonstration flats over shops programme providing £25 million between 1992–93 and 1994–95 to bring empty space above retail premises into residential use. This created some 1,500 additional housing units directly and many more indirectly. Capital funding for such schemes has continued under the Government's housing partnership fund which provided £30 million a year in 1995–96 and 1996–97 for innovative housing projects including the provision of flats over shops. We will be publishing a research report by the South Bank university early in the new year which evaluates the flats over shops programme and other similar initiatives.

Battersea Power Station

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the London borough of Wandsworth last forwarded a report to his Department on the overall condition of (a) the structure and (b) the site of Battersea power station; and if he will place a copy of the report in the Library. [8515]

Sir Paul Beresford: I have received no such reports. The building is regularly inspected by English Heritage. The last such inspection was on 5 December.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the state of the internal structure of Battersea power station. [8637]

Sir Paul Beresford: No. The building is regularly inspected by English Heritage. The last such inspection was on 5 December and is a matter for the Secretary of State for National Heritage.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when officials from his Department last visited the site of Battersea power station; what reports were published on their visit; and where such reports can be obtained. [8638]

Sir Paul Beresford: Officials visited Battersea power station on 3 December for a presentation of the proposals to redevelop the site. No reports have been published.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the acreage of the site of Battersea power station. [8514]

Sir Paul Beresford: I understand that the site is some 30 acres—12 hectares.

New Housing (Access)

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department has commissioned on the additional building costs involved in extending part M of the Building Regulations to improve access to new housing; who will be consulted in the course of that research; and when he expects it to be completed. [8293]

Mr. Clappison: My Department has not yet commissioned any such research, but we have agreed to undertake a joint study with the House-Builders Federation on the additional building costs involved in extending part M of the Building Regulations to improve access to new housing. To this end, officials have written to eight local authorities to ask for their help in selecting suitable schemes for the study. Once all the authorities have replied, the Department will be in a position to commission the research and establish a date for its completion.

Local Government Finance

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the (i) total standard spending assessment and police grant and (ii) total external support including revenue support grant, non-domestic rates, SSA reduction grant and police grants to be received by (a) all local authorities, (b) each class of local authority, (c) education authorities, (d) authorities other than police authorities and (e) all authorities, in (1) 1997–98 and (2) 1996–97 and for each the change over 1996–97 in pounds and percentages, adjusting 1996–97 amounts for local government reorganisation and for changed local authority functions and responsibilities, and the further transfer for responsibilities for care in the community from central Government budgets in 1997–98; and if he will list each such adjustment and its monetary value; [8002]

(2) what is the (i) total standard spending and (ii) total aggregate external finance for (a) all local authorities and (b) all local authorities other than police authorities in England in 1997–98 and 1996–97, and for each the change over 1996–97 in pounds and percentages, adjusting 1996–97 totals for changed local authority functions and responsibilities, and the further transfer for responsibilities for care in the community from central Government budgets in 1997–98; and if he will list each such adjustment and its monetary value. [8003]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 9 December 1996]: I have placed the information requested in the Library.

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is (i) the total standard spending and (ii) the total aggregate external finance for (a) all local authorities and (b) all education authorities in England in (1) 1997–98 and (2) 1996–97; and in each case what was the change over 1996–97 in pounds and percentages, adjusting 1996–97 totals for changed local authority functions and responsibilities in 1997–98, and the further transfer of responsibilities for care in the community from central Government budgets in 1997–98; [8564]

(2) what are (i) the total standard spending assessments and police grant external support and (ii) the total external support to be received by (a) all local authorities, (b) each class of authority, (c) education authorities, (d) all authorities other than policy authorities and (e) all authorities, in (1) 1997–98 and (2) 1996–97; and in each case what was the change over 1996–97 in pounds and percentages, adjusting 1996–97 amounts for local government reorganisation and for changed local authority functions and responsibilities in 1997–98. [8565]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier. The remaining information is contained in the table.

Table 1: Total Standard Spending and Aggregate External Finance for Education Authorities

	Adjusted 1996–97 (£ million)	Provisional 1997–98 (£ million)	Change (£ million)	Change Percentage
Total Standard Spending for Education Authorities	35,198.8	36,011.4	812.6	2.3
Total Standard Spending for Education Authorities (adjusted for 1997–98 Community Care STG)	35,517.5	36,011.4	494.0	1.4
Aggregate External Finance for Education Authorities	27,426.3	27,879.8	453.5	1.7
Aggregate External Finance for Education Authorities (adjusted for 1997–98 Community Care STG)	27,745.0	27,879.8	134.90.5

Notes:

1. The aggregates for TSS and AEF presented in the table include only those types of specific and special grants which are allocated solely to education authorities (whether or not the grant relates to education). Some £150 million of further specific grants are allocated both to some Education Authorities and to other classes of authority. These are housing benefit administration grant, council tax benefit administration grant, national parks grant and part of the ethnic minorities (s11) grant.

2. The figures for adjusted TSS and AEF are derived from information about standard spending assessments for education authorities and total external support for education authorities set out in tables 3 and 4 of the information provided in the answer referred to above. The notes to those tables provide details of the derivation of the figures.

3. All figures for TSS and AEF exclude 1997–98 reorganisation SCAs. They also exclude funding for specified bodies, the city offset and reorganisation: transitional reduction grant.

Access to Information

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he plans to publish his reply to the first report of the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities on freedom of access to information on the environment, HL9; and if he will make a statement. [8465]

Mr. Clappison: The recommendations in the report are being carefully considered. The Government's reply will be published in due course.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will suspend imports of genetically modified maize until a full assessment has been made of the hazards to human health and a proper labelling regime is in place. [8129]

Mr. Clappison: In accordance with Council directive 90/220/EEC on the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms, an assessment on the risks posed to human health and the environment for the genetically modified maize has been carried out by member states. It is now up to the European Commission to take a decision on the importation and marketing of the genetically modified maize. This decision will be in accordance with the provisions of the directive, which include provisions for labelling.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the ministerial group on energy efficiency last met; and if he will reconvene it. [8695]

Mr. Clappison: The work of the former ministerial group on energy efficiency has been continued by Green Ministers, who met most recently on 28 October 1996.

Coastal Byelaws

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the proposed discussion paper which reviews the byelaw-making powers for the coast. [8910]

Mr. Clappison: The Department of the Environment has today published "Byelaw Powers for the Coast: A Discussion Paper". The paper sets out the main issues regarding current scope and use of the relevant powers in England, ways in which present arrangements might be improved and updated, and the relationship with broader management aims and initiatives. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House, and the paper will be widely distributed.

Sustainable Development

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of the UK round table on sustainable development. [9101]

Mr. Gummer: The round table was set up in January 1995 and is now approaching the end of its initial two-year term. The Government are encouraged by the progress that the round table has made during this period in developing its role as a body which can build consensus on priorities and actions to assist the UK's pursuit of sustainable development. The round table is providing an increasingly valuable and welcome contribution to the continuing debate about integrating economic development and environmental protection and enhancement. I am therefore pleased to announce that its life will be extended for a further two years until January 1999. I am considering, in consultation with my colleagues, what the round table's membership should be during that period, with a view to strengthening it in some areas.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Cameroons

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the major development projects in the Cameroons which have received a United Kingdom contribution. [8434]

Dr. Liam Fox: In the last decade we have funded the following major projects:

- In-service teacher education and training in the Anglophone provinces.
- Agricultural research.
- Forest management and regeneration.
- Community forestry development.
- Conservation and management of natural resources on Mount Cameroon.
- Rural development component of Korup national park conservation project.

The last three project are on-going.

World Bank (Environmental Impact Assessments)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to request the World bank to undertake an environmental impact assessment before approving funds for major development projects. [8410]

Dr. Liam Fox: The World bank recently completed a report which took stock of the bank's progress in implementing its environmental assessment policy. We welcome the steps which the bank has taken to ensure that environmental concerns are properly reflected in its operations, and continue to press for further improvements.

Great Lakes Region

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the current humanitarian requirements of the Great Lakes region of Africa; and if he will make a statement. [8576]

Dr. Liam Fox: According to the United Nations Department of Humanitarian Affairs on 2 December, £52 million had so far been pledged by donors in response to the UN inter-agency appeal for the Great Lakes region. This does not include a commitment of £129 million agreed by the European Union on 6 December. The appeal covered total estimated requirements for food aid up to June 1997 and certain other requirements up to January 1997 estimated altogether at £155 million. The Government of Rwanda have also revised their programme to reintegrate returning refugees and re-establish productive communities. On 20 November, my noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development announced a commitment of £10 million to address immediate needs in the Great Lakes region.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the current security situation in the Great Lakes region of Africa; and if he will make a statement. [8575]

Dr. Fox: The region remains unstable and afflicted by violence. The security situation in Burundi is of particular concern. We continue to support regional efforts to resolve the underlying political problems, and welcome President Moi's intention to convene a further regional summit on Nairobi on 16 December. We also look forward to the report of the UN special envoy to Zaire and the Great Lakes, Ambassador Chretien.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government are taking to facilitate the holding of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region of Africa. [8579]

Dr. Fox: We are committed with our EU partners to early preparations for a conference in peace, security and development in the Great Lakes, under UN-Organisation of Africa Unity auspices. EU envoy Aldo Ajello continues to work to facilitate such a conference. We await the report of UN special envoy Ambassador Chretien, who has been tasked to consider next steps on the conference. We see an important role for regional summits such as that planned for Nairobi on 16 December in preparing the ground for a wider conference.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has recently held with representatives of the Governments of (a) Zaire, (b) Rwanda, (c) Burundi, (d) Uganda and (e) Tanzania. [8577]

Dr. Fox: My right hon. and learned Friend met His Excellency the President of Tanzania on 11 November. We are in regular contact with representatives of the Governments in the region in the search for lasting peace and stability in the Great Lakes.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the current refugee situation in the Great Lakes region of Africa, with particular reference to (a) the numbers of refugees, (b) the geographical situation of the refugees and (c) the health of the refugees. [8578]

Dr. Fox: On numbers and location, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development to Lord Judd in another place on 5 December, Official Report, House of Lords, column 61. The condition of refugees in camps in Uganda, Tanzania and Rwanda is generally good. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees reports that substantial numbers of refugees remain beyond the current reach of aid agencies in eastern Zaire. Their condition is unknown but is a cause for concern. With the international community, we are pressing the parties to the conflict to allow access to those in need.

Nigeria

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent Commonwealth ministerial action group mission to Nigeria. [8580]

Dr. Liam Fox: The Commonwealth ministerial action group visited Nigeria from 18 to 20 November. The CMAG met General Abacha, representatives of the National Electoral Commission and the transition committees, leaders of the recently registered political parties, traditional rulers and the chairman of the Nigerian Human Rights Commission. The group welcomed the release of three human rights activists during the visit, but pressed for the immediate release of all political prisoners, including Chief Abiola. The CMAG also urged Nigerians to resolve the case of the Ogoni 19, review prison conditions and restore accountable civilian government. My noble Friend Baroness Chalker also had bilateral discussions with human rights and pro-democracy groups. The group will meet again in the new year to consider next steps.

United Nations Industrial Development Organisation

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans the British Government have for continued participation in UNIDO; and what discussions he is currently having with representatives of UNIDO. [8688]

Dr. Liam Fox: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on 10 December, at column 100.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Publicity

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much her Department has spent on promotional or public information campaigns in each of the last five years; and how much she estimates will be spent on these campaigns during the (i) current and (ii) next financial years. [7543]

Mr. Sproat: My Department's public relations activities are normally met in-house. During 1993–94, my Department spent £62,500 contracting a company to assist with a programme of events to mark the 50th anniversary of D day.

Other than that, there have been no individual promotional or public information campaigns undertaken by the Department since its inception in 1992. There are at present no plans for any such campaigns in the future.

National Lottery

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the eligibility of canal restoration schemes for funding from the national lottery funding bodies. [7949]

Mr. Sproat: Canal restoration schemes are eligible to apply for funding from the national lottery. The distributing bodies make their funding decisions independently of Government, and against their published criteria.

The Millennium Commission has awarded £11.9 million to the Rochdale canal trust to restore 32 miles of the Rochdale canal. The heritage lottery fund made its largest grant to date, £25.1 million, to British Waterways to secure the structure, operation, and environment of the 87-mile Kennet and Avon canal, making it accessible for the enjoyment of future generations.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will take steps to enable animal welfare groups to be eligible for lottery funding; and if she will make a statement. [7777]

Mr. Sproat: Any organisation established for charitable, benevolent or philanthropic purposes, including animal welfare charities, is eligible to apply to the National Lottery Charities Board. Animal welfare charities are, therefore, welcome to make appropriate applications. The board makes grants to charities and voluntary organisations according to the priorities set for each grants round; I understand that chief executives of several animal welfare charities have welcomed this approach and agreed that the most appropriate round in which to apply is that aimed at improving people's living environment; this round is due to be launched next year.

Broadcasting

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to her answer of 3 December, Official Report, column 589, how the shortlist for the job of chairman of the BBC Broadcasting Council for Wales was drawn up; on what dates the interviews took place; on what dates the unsuccessful candidates were told the news; what assessment was made of the recommendations of the Nolan committee; and what use was made of the public appointments unit in processing this appointment. [7986]

Mr. Sproat: In considering the appointment of the BBC national governor for Wales, who chairs the Broadcasting Council for Wales, we are applying the principles established by the Nolan committee as set out in guidance issued by the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments. Further information about the process can be made available once the appointment has been made by Her Majesty in Council.

British Library Catalogue

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if all the books currently being transferred to the new British library have been catalogued. [8198]

Mr. Sproat: Responsibility for transferring the books to the new British library building at St. Pancras falls to the British library. It has confirmed that all the books currently being transferred have been catalogued.

Television Licences (Revenue)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the total revenue from television licences over the last 12-month period for which figures are available in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Scotland. [8011]

Mr. Sproat: Total television licence revenue in the United Kingdom for the financial year 1995–96 was £1,820 million, of which an estimated £156 million was collected in Scotland.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much her Department will spend on Christmas trees and decorations this year; how many Christmas trees will be bought for her Department's headquarters; and what are the type and country of origin of the trees. [7564]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 6 December 1996]: A Christmas tree of British origin, Abis Nordmanniana, with decorations will be purchased at a total cost of £65 for one of my Department's HQ buildings.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the (a) cost and (b) percentage of the full television licence paid by (i) pensioners, (ii) registered blind people and (iii) registered deaf people; if she will make it her policy to reduce the cost of the television licence for each of these groups; and if she will make a statement. [7955]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Television licence fees are currently £89.50 for colour licences and £30 for black and white. Registered blind people are entitled to a reduction of £1.25 from the full licence fee. However, a sound-only television monitor, available from the Royal National Institute for the Blind, may be operated without a licence. Moreover, blind people can enjoy the full range of the BBC's radio services. There is no general concession for pensioners or for registered deaf people. However, pensioners and registered blind and deaf people living in qualifying accommodation can benefit from the concessionary television licence scheme, under which licences cost £5. If the Government introduced reduced-fee television licences for all pensioners and registered blind and deaf people, this would be very costly in terms of lost revenue for the BBC. it would lead to a significant rise in licence fees for all other viewers, irrespective of their means, which is why the Government have no such plans.

The Government have encouraged the BBC to introduce a range of payment options to enable television licence fee payers to spread the cost of their licence. However, the Government do not consider the television licence fee a proper instrument of social policy: the appropriate way to help those with special needs is through the pensions and benefits system.

Mid-week Lottery

Mr. Cann: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what discussions she has had with Office of the National Lottery on the numbers to be used by Camelot in the proposed mid-week lottery. [8041]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 9 December 1996]: None. Camelot applied to hold a mid-week draw using the numbers 1 to 49. The decision to approve the mid-week draw was made by the Director General of the National Lottery who published a full statement of the reasons for his decision.

PRIME MINISTER

The Union

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the strategic and economic interests which require the maintenance of the Union between Scotland and England and which do not apply to the Union with Northern Ireland. [7202]

The Prime Minister: I firmly believe that the maintenance of the Union is strongly in the interests of each part of the United Kingdom, as well as of the United Kingdom as a whole, but there are no strategic or economic interests which could override the democratic wishes of the people of each constituent part of the United Kingdom in relation to their place within it.

HEALTH

Accident Prevention

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the recommendations of the accident prevention task force. [7983]

Mr. Horam: The accident prevention task force concentrated its efforts on identifying outstanding research and information needs in accident prevention. Its conclusions were published in the following reports which have been placed in the Library:

Improving Information on Accidents (PHIS 19), DH 1995

Agreeing an Accident Information Structure (PHIS 19B), DH 1996

Health of the Nation Accident Reduction Targets - A Research Review: What Further Work is Needed? - Dr. Irene Higginson, DH June 1995.

The Effectiveness of Interventions to Prevent Accidental Injury to Young Persons Aged 15–24 Years - Prof. Jon Nicholl et al.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department has abolished the accident prevention task force. [7982]

Mr. Horam: The accident prevention task force was disbanded in May 1996 on completion of its work.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his role on the interdepartmental group on accident prevention strategies; and if he will list the programme of work currently being undertaken by that group. [7984]

Mr. Horam: There is no such group.

Dental Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists solely offered national health service treatment in (a) September 1992 and (b) September 1996. [7972]

Mr. Malone: Data on the number of dentists who offer solely national health service treatment are not collected centrally.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 28 November, Official Report, column 372, if he will list the number of national health service dentists for each health authority in England on (a) 30 September 1992 and (b) 30 September 1996. [7985]

Mr. Malone: Data on the number of general dental service dentists were collected by family health services authority before 1 April 1996 and by health authority thereafter. The data at 30 September 1992 and 30 September 1996 are set out in tables 1 and 2.

Boundary changes have taken place and even where the authorities have the same name the authority areas may not be identical.

2. Some dentists have a contract with a more than one FHSA/HA, these dentists are counted only once.
3. The figures exclude salaried, hospital and community dentists.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the NHS executive's regional office network monitors the mental health services' implementation of the care programme approach; and if the results of the monitoring are publicly available. [8263]

Mr. Burns: Implementation of the care programme approach is monitored via quarterly returns made by health authorities to the national health service executive.

The results of the monitoring are not routinely published.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 4 November, Official Report, columns 397–98, what was the average length of the previous stay in hospital of the 5,000 patients aged 16 to 64 years readmitted as emergencies within 90 days of discharge. [8259]

Mr. Burns: The information requested is not available centrally.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, Official Report, column 197, what schemes for (i) residential and (ii) 24-hour nursed care accommodation for mentally ill patients under 65 years are currently being negotiated under the private finance initiative. [8257]

Mr. Horam: All capital schemes have to be tested for private finance. The table shows those schemes with a capital value of £1 million or more that are currently, or will be, tested for private finance and which are wholly or partly for 24-hour nursed care or residential accommodation for mentally ill patients under 65. Information on smaller schemes is not held centrally.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to discuss with the Royal College of Psychiatrists the reasons for the readmission of 5,000 patients aged 16 to 64 years to hospitals as emergencies within 90 days of previous discharge between April and June 1996. [8261]

Mr. Burns: None.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many psychiatric patients aged between 16 and 64 years who were discharged from hospital in the period from July to September were readmitted to hospital within 90 days of discharge or by the present date. [8260]

Mr. Burns: From the information collected centrally it is not possible to identify how many of the psychiatric patients aged 16 to 64 who were discharged during the period July to September have subsequently been readmitted as emergencies.

Meningitis

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of the link between over-prescribing of antibiotics and meningitis clusters. [8024]

Mr. Horam: We are aware of the recent publication of a scientific paper reporting on a study conducted by the Gloucester public health laboratory in 1987 which a Sunday newspaper reported as suggesting an association between meningitis and the high use of antibiotics. However, the scientific paper, which has produced some interesting observations, explores several possible explanations. Further work is necessary before any conclusions can be reached and the public health laboratory service's meningococcal committee is to consider recommendations on future work.

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many incidents of each strain of meningitis have been reported in England and Wales in each year since 1990. [8025]

Mr. Horam: The numbers of laboratory confirmed cases of meningococcal meningitis since 1990 are given in the table:

Isolates of N Meningitidis received at the Public Health Laboratory Service's Meningococcal Reference Laboratory 1990–1996, England and Wales

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were diagnosed as suffering from meningitis in each of the area health authorities in West Yorkshire in the past 12 months. [8092]

Mr. Horam: Information is not available in the form requested. Notification data are routinely collected by local authority and district rather than health authority. Provisional numbers of cases of meningitis notified to the Office for National Statistics, and the notification rates per 100,000 population, for the county of West Yorkshire for the last 12 months are given in the table:

Provisional numbers of meningitis notifications in West Yorkshire October 1995–September 1996.

Kirklees	15	3.9
Leeds	44	6.1
Wakefield	6	1.9
West Yorkshire	115	5.5

[1] Notifications are made on the suspicion of clinical disease, not all of which will be confirmed cases of meningitis.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice his Department has given or plans to give to local health authorities in respect of a possible winter meningitis outbreak; and if he will make a statement. [8093]

Mr. Horam: Guidelines on the control of meningococcal infection have been issued by the public health laboratory service since 1989. These are regularly updated and published and copies are sent to all directors of public health and consultants in communicable disease control. The most recent guidelines on the control of meningococcal infection were issued on 8 December 1995 in the PHLS's communicable disease review.

Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the annual total of recorded incidents of MRSA in England and Wales for each year since 1992 in (a) hospitals, (b) nursing homes and (c) other locations. [8029]

Mr. Horam: Data are not available in the form requested.

The public health laboratory service publishes aggregate data on the occurrence of methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus from isolates voluntarily submitted by hospitals in England and Wales for specialist typing. The total numbers of incidents—three or more patients with the same strain of MRSA in a month from the same hospitals—since 1992 are as follows:

1992: 339

1993: 549

1994: 1,073

1995: 1,575

1996[1]: 1,764

[1] to 31 October.

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many fatalities have been recorded as due to MRSA in each year since 1990. [8031]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr Flynn) on 19 November at columns 532–33.

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the threat of MRSA in hospitals; and what precautions are taken against its spread. [8032]

Mr. Horam: Methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus is no more likely to cause infection and no worse infection than methicillin-sensitive strains of the organism. Because, however, MRSA is more difficult to treat, it can pose a threat to certain vulnerable patients. Most experts therefore believe efforts to prevent its spread are worth while.

All hospitals have specialist infection control teams whose function is to advise on the precautions necessary, in the individual circumstances of each hospital and according to the type of patient, to prevent the spread of infection. The Department issued guidance to the national health service in September 1994 on the control of MRSA and in March 1995 on the general control of infections in hospitals, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on research into MRSA in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8237]

Mr. Malone: The main agency through which the Government support medical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council. The council is an independent body which receives its grant in aid from the Department of Trade and Industry. The council does not currently fund any research specifically into methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus. However, the council does have a portfolio of research on staphylococcal bacteria in general, which underpins research into MRSA. This amounted to £200,000 in 1994–95 and £144,000 in 1995–96.

In addition, two research projects have been funded at regional level, amounting to £47,706 in total.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many incidents of MRSA in 1995 occurred in (a) geriatric wards, (b) intensive care, (c) surgical wards, (d) general medical wards and (e) other wards. [8034]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what factors underlie the trend in reported incidents of MRSA in hospitals; and what evaluation he has made of the extent to which (a) standards of hygiene, (b) re-use of infected equipment and (c) patient turnover contribute to the spread of MRSA. [8037]

Mr. Horam: The trend in reported incidents of methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus—three or more patients with the same strain of MRSA in a month from the same hospitals—reflects, in part, the emergence and spread, from the early 1990s, of two new strains of MRSA. Other factors include changes in medical practice, such as the transfer of more patients to specialist units in other hospitals.

Good personal hygiene, such as thorough hand washing, is important in preventing the spread of all types of infections, including those caused by MRSA. The Department has made no evaluation of re-use of equipment and patient throughput on the spread of MRSA. These are matters for individual trusts and health authorities to consider.

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's policy in respect of the practice of sending home patients with MRSA in order to prevent its spread in hospital. [8038]

Mr. Horam: The Department issued guidance to the national health service in September 1994 on the control of methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus. MRSA does not pose a risk to healthy people.

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many incidents of MRSA were reported during 1995 in (a) each member state of the European Community and (b) the United States of America. [8039]

Mr. Horam: We are not aware of any other country which routinely compiles national data on methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the drugs currently being trialled in the United Kingdom aimed at alleviating the symptoms of MS. [8214]

Mr. Malone: Such information is confidential. Section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 precludes the disclosure of confidential information received in pursuance of the Act.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those areas of the United Kingdom where there are MS clusters. [8197]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Questions relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, respectively.

General Practitioner Fundholders

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each health authority the amount borrowed from the underspend by local general practitioner fundholders in each of the last five years; and how much of this amount has been repaid by each health authority to date. [8035]

Mr. Malone: The information requested is not held centrally. We expect health authorities and fundholding general practitioners to work together to make the best use of resources in year.

Repair and Maintenance Backlog

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the overall repair and maintenance backlog at NHS facilities within the areas controlled by each NHS executive regional office in each year since 1991. [8036]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 19 November 1996 at column 529.

Disability Allowance

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department proposes to take to monitor the impact of the changes to the disability allowance mobility component for hospital patients with reference to the extent to which (a) the mobility opportunities for hospital patients are fully maintained, (b) patients leave hospital treatment prematurely to avoid the cut-off point for the mobility component and (c) the rehabilitation of hospital patients is hindered. [8211]

Mr. Horam: None. This is a matter for local decision by health authorities and trusts.

Learning Difficulties

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he is issuing to local authorities concerning the evaluation of alternative care options for people with learning difficulties. [8209]

Mr. Burns: I will write to all directors of social services and chief executives of health authorities about the second phase of the research project evaluating various types of residential support for people with learning disabilities before Christmas. I intend to make it clear in my letter that departmental guidance remains as set out in LAC(92)15, copies of which are available in the Library, and that therefore all forms of residential provision including village communities remain options to be considered by those planning and purchasing services.

NHS Dentistry Contracts

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for how long records relating to the payment of NHS dentistry contracts are retained. [8433]

Mr. Malone: The dental practice board retains dental claim forms in prior approval cases for 18 months and non-prior approval cases for 13 months. The dental payment schedules are retained on microfiche back to June 1989.

Vitamin B12 Unit

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the timetable for the independent review of the vitamin B12 unit at the Chelsea and Westminster Healthcare NHS trust; who are the members of the review body; and what are the terms of reference of the review. [8430]

Mr. Horam: The inquiry into the work of the vitamin B12 unit at the Chelsea and Westminster hospital is the responsibility of, and has been commissioned by, the Chelsea and Westminster Healthcare national health service trust.

The members of the inquiry are Professor Albert Aynsley-Green, Nuffield professor of child health, and Professor Brian Neville, professor of paediatric neurosciences at the institute of child health, university of London. It is intended that the inquiry will finish by March 1997 and report to the trust board in April.

The terms of reference are:

1. To review the process of the hospital's clinical management of the patients for whom the vitamin B12 unit has provided advice or resources for investigation from 1 April 1994 to date.
2. In particular to advise whether reasonable steps have been taken by the trust to ensure the appropriate treatment of the patients according to the principles of evidence-based medicine and effective and safe healthcare.
3. As necessary, to consider and review issues which may arise from an NHS point of view with regard to the management aspects of clinical research and the treatment associated with it.
4. To advise on the future NHS management arrangements by the trust for patients whose neurodevelopmental diagnosis and/or treatment may involve the services of the vitamin B12 unit.

Injury Prevention and Control

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department has signed the Melbourne declaration on injury prevention and control, adopted on 22 February. [8644]

Mr. Horam: The "Melbourne declaration" does not provide for formal endorsement by Government of its conclusions. The Government demonstrated their commitment to accident prevention by including it as a key area in their "The Health of the Nation" strategy launched in 1992.

WALES

NHS Pension Scheme

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what actuarial reports have been carried out on the effect on the NHS pension scheme's overall liabilities of including general practitioners' staff in the scheme; and if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the reports. [7482]

Mr. Hague: The Government are considering the case for allowing general practitioners' practice staff to enter the national health service pension scheme and a decision will be announced soon.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) hip replacements, (b) hysterectomies, (c) cataract extractions, (d) tonsillectomies, (e) kidney transplants and (f) hernia operations were carried out by the NHS in Wales in each of the last three years; what was the average waiting time for each operation in each year; and if he will make a statement. [7468]

Mr. Hague: The information is given in the following table:

Number and average waiting time for specified operations

	1993–94		1994–95		[1]1995–96
	Number	Average waiting time (days)	Number	Average waiting time (days)	Number	Average waiting time (days)
Hip replacements	1,649	161	1,842	152	1,793	138

Kidney transplants	9	99	8	23	10	24
Hernia operations	3,748	91	3,918	103	3,975	110

[1] Data for 1995–96 are not comparable to earlier years as records are not yet available for all hospitals.

Dental Services

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many new NHS registrations in Wales with a dental practitioner occurred in each six-month period between January 1990 and January 1994 and in each month since January 1994; how many of these are estimated to have been duplicate registrations; and if he will make a statement. [7491]

Mr. Hague: Information on the number of new registrations is given in the following table. It is not possible to identify how many of the registrations were for patients who re-registered after lapsing, were already registered with another dentist, or who were completely new registrations.

Number of new NHS registrations with dentists in Wales

Period	Number	Period	Number
October–December 1990[1]	449,989	March 1995	53,721

[1] There are no new registrations in October 1990, the first month of the new dental contract.

Council House Repairs

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what amounts of cash were available for the modernisation and repair of council homes in (i) 1992, (ii) 1993 and (iii) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [7772]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Credit approvals made available by the Department for capital expenditure on council housing can be supplemented by authorities' use of some capital receipts and revenue contributions. In addition, councils have some flexibility in the level of spending on revenue repairs within the housing revenue account. The following table, therefore, shows capital and revenue spending by Welsh councils in cash terms on modernisation and repair of council houses in 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1995–96.

£ million

	Revenue spending	Capital spending	Total
1992–93	112.4	75.4	187.8
1993–94	119.6	84.6	204.2
1994–95	126.3	88.4	214.7

Physiotherapy

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he proposes to reduce the waiting times for those seeking physiotherapy after suffering accidents and injuries; and if he will make a statement. [7774]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The number of training places for occupational therapy and physiotherapy being contracted for by the NHS in Wales has increased from an intake of 25 in 1993–94 to 57 in 1996–97 for occupational therapists. The number of training places has also increased for physiotherapy from an intake of 36 in 1993–94 to 69 in 1996–97. This increased level of training will be maintained in 1997–98.

Public Appointments

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many re-appointments to non-departmental public boards in Wales there were in 1995; and if he will make a statement. [7910]

Mr. Hague: I or my predecessor made 123 re-appointments to NDPBS or NHS bodies in Wales in 1995.

Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the amount available to Tai Cymru in (a) 1992 and (b) the latest available year for new housing association homes in Wales. [7763]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The capital programme for housing associations, including private finance, in 1991–92 was £160.4 million. In the current financial year this is forecast to be £154.4 million.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many social housing lettings were made in (a) 1992 and (b) 1995. [7767]

Mr. Evans: In the financial years 1992–93 and 1995–96, there were 17,089 and 21,088 lettings, excluding transfer and exchanges. These data are a combination of local authority lettings figures from annual returns, together with a summary of housing association lettings from the continual recording of the lettings system.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of new homes required up to the year 2000. [7768]

Mr. Evans: Estimates of additional homes required were published in the 1992-based household projections, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. This report expected the average number of additional homes each year, up to the year 2000, to be 8,800.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many private homes were built in (a) 1992 and (b) 1995. [7769]

Mr. Evans: This information is in table 2.3 of Welsh housing statistics 1996, which is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of (a) council and (b) housing association homes required in each of the years to 2000. [7770]

Mr. Evans: A breakdown in the form requested is not available. Our estimate for subsidised dwellings for each years is between 2,500 and 3,500.

Departmental Running Costs

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the revenue costs of running his Department in (i) 1994 and (ii) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [7911]

Mr. Hague: My Department's running costs were £77.4 million in 1994–95 and £74.9 million in 1995–96.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future role of the community health councils. [8172]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I envisage no change in the statutory roles and functions of community health councils in Wales.

Graduate Unemployment

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many graduates are currently on the unemployed register in Wales. [8524]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The unemployment register does not hold details of the qualifications held by claimants so the information requested is not available.

Injury Prevention and Control

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department has signed the Melbourne declaration on injury prevention and control, adopted on 22 February. [8642]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Melbourne declaration does not provide for formal endorsement by Government of its conclusions. Its main recommendations are, however, already being taken forward in Wales through implementation of the "Protocol for Investment in Health Gain: Injuries". Injury prevention and control is also identified as a health priority area in "Caring for the Future". Welsh mortality rates for injury are now among the lowest in Europe.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current level of spending on the NHS in Wales; and what it was in 1993. [8171]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The level of provision for the NHS in Wales in 1993–94 was £1,975 million and in 1996–97 is £2,275 million.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Part-time Working

17. Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she plans to take to assist people who are currently working part time who want to find a full-time job. [7067]

Mr. Forth: We shall continue to oppose unnecessary regulations, such as the social chapter, the national minimum wage and the working time directive which would make it harder for employees to choose freely between full-time and part-time work.

Clinical Staff Pay

18. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals she has to ensure pay comparability between clinical academic staff and national health service staff. [7068]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has placed a condition of grant on the Higher Education Funding Council for England from 1997–98. This will require the council to enable universities and colleges to meet any additional costs for medical schools arising from any pay increase awarded by the Government to NHS clinicians.

Education Budget (London)

20. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the effect of the budget settlement on (a) class sizes and (b) education attainment in (i) Southwark and (ii) London local education authorities. [7070]

Mr. Robin Squire: The effects of the settlement upon class sizes and the attainment of pupils will depend upon decisions taken by Southwark and other London LEAs. If they give priority to the chalk face and to improving teacher quality, there is no reason why class sizes should rise.

Lifetime Learning

21. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to increase acceptance of the concept of a lifetime of learning. [7071]

Mr. Paice: We fully support the concept of lifetime learning. Copies of the Department's policy framework on lifetime learning published in June are available in the Library. Our most recent initiative to promote lifetime learning are learning line—a new free national telephone helpline on learning opportunities to be launched in September 1997—support for further development of local partnership activities, and our recently published strategic guidance "TECs Beyond 2000" which asks TECs to extend their work with employers and their other partners to create a culture for lifetime learning locally.

Higher Education Vouchers

22. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make it her policy to introduce a voucher system for higher education. [7072]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to introduce a voucher system for higher education. She has set up an inquiry under Sir Ron Dearing to look at how our higher education system should develop to meet the needs of the UK over the next 20 years. We will consider carefully its recommendations on the future funding of higher education, when it reports next summer.

Examination Results

23. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) grant-maintained and (b) local education authority schools are represented in the top 50 state schools measured by A-level results. [7073]

Mrs. Gillan: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring).

Private Finance Initiative

24. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she will next meet the Committee of Vice Chancellors and Principals to discuss the role of the private finance initiative. [7074]

Mr. Forth: There are no plans to do so at present.

Assisted Places Scheme

25. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her most recent assessment of the impact of the assisted places scheme on the feeder schools from which the assisted pupils are drawn. [7075]

Mrs. Gillan: The assisted places scheme gives able children from low-income families the opportunity of an excellent education at good independent schools.

Job Creation

26. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to encourage the creation of more full-time jobs. [7076]

Mr. Forth: We shall continue to develop the policies and programmes which have reduced unemployment by nearly 1 million and increased employment by nearly three quarters of a million since 1993 and which have reduced unemployment in Scotland, Wales and every English region to below the average rate in the European Union.

Corporal Punishment

28. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on her policy in respect of corporal punishment in the independent school sector. [7079]

Mr. Forth: We do not support any change in the present law which prohibits the use of corporal punishment for publicly funded pupils in independent schools. It is, however, still permissable for parents of privately funded pupils in independent schools on grounds of parental freedom to choose a school with disciplinary arrangements of which they approve. But where it is administered, the law requires that such punishment must not be inhuman or degrading.

Teachers (Payment for Extra Work)

29. Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on her policy with regard to the payment of teachers for out-of-hours and extra-curriculum work. [7080]

Mr. Forth: The statutory conditions of employment for teachers set rates of pay for the whole of a teacher's job. Within that framework, governing bodies can at their discretion pay teachers for a variety of extra-curricular professional activities that might take place out of school hours.

Dyslexia

30. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what special provision she has made with respect to teaching pupils with dyslexia. [7081]

Mrs. Gillan: The code of practice on the identification and assessment of special educational needs emphasises the need for early identification of learning difficulties such as dyslexia, and sets out guidance to local education authorities and schools on the assessment of a dyslexic child. In 1995–96 almost £1 million of expenditure under the grants for education support and training programme supported training for teachers of dyslexic pupils. The Department is supporting research into assessment and teaching strategies for dyslexia with grants of more than £200,000 over the period 1992 to 1998. The Government propose that there should be a particular focus on literacy in the new national curriculum for initial teacher training; the Teacher Training Agency will be consulting on this in the new year, when comments from organisations representing dyslexia will be welcome.

Age Discrimination

31. Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to reduce discrimination against potential employees on the grounds of age. [7082]

Mrs. Gillan: The Department promotes the Government's campaign for older workers which persuades employers to recruit, train and retain them on merit, disregarding age. Through the campaign, which is supported by complementary booklets, regional presentations to employers and media coverage, we offer help, advice and support to older people seeking work. There is sound evidence that the campaign is working; many employers are reviewing their practices and policies towards older workers.

Education Authority Expenditure

32. Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many local education authorities increased the amount spent on administration and reduced the amount spent on schools in the last year for which information is available. [7084]

Mr. Robin Squire: In 1994–95, 14 LEAs increased spending on central administration while reducing spending on schools, by comparison with the previous year.

Primary School Standards

33. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what new measures she is taking to monitor standards in the primary sector. [7085]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government's policies now enable the performance of children of primary age to be closely monitored at national, local, school and pupil level. The two main mechanisms are the assessment of performance of pupils against the national curriculum, and the regular independent inspection of all schools. We published last month the national results of the 1996 statutory assessments of all seven and 11-year-olds in English, mathematics and science, and in March we shall publish primary school performance tables. Some 7,000 primary schools have been independently inspected, with a summary of the report sent to each parent. These measures enable parents, schools and others to monitor children's progress at this vital stage in education.

Project Work

34. Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of those participating in project work have gained permanent employment. [7086]

Mr. Forth: It is too early to make a proper assessment of the experience of those who leave project work, as the pilot has been running for only eight months. A full survey of those who leave project work is being carried out, and will include details of the jobs they have entered. Results of the survey will be published in 1997. Early indications, however, are that twice as many people leave project work to enter a job as leave a comparable group outside the pilot areas. There is no significant difference in the rates at which all those who leave project work, and those who leave a comparable group, return to the unemployment register.

School Discipline

35. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking with regard to discipline in schools. [7089]

Mr. Forth: The Education Bill introduced on 30 October includes a package of measures to strengthen schools' ability to take action in the face of poor behaviour and discipline; to help ensure there is proper support for schools in dealing with pupils with behaviour problems; and to promote effective provision for such pupils out of school where necessary.

Pupil Achievements (Gender Differences)

36. Mr. Brian David Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to address the gap between the achievements of girls and boys at school. [7090]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government's policies are intended to raise standards for all pupils, and are doing so. The improvement of girls has been even more rapid than for boys at certain ages. While this rapid improvement is very welcome, Her Majesty's chief inspector has drawn attention to the low attainment of some boys, especially at key stages 3 and 4. It is primarily for schools to address gaps in performance of different groups of pupils. In setting its annual performance targets, each school should consider how best to develop the potential of every category of pupil.

School Performance Tables

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she plans to publish value added performance tables. [7078]

Mrs. Gillan: The School Curriculum and Assessment Authority will be reporting on the development of value added measures in February 1997. Consideration will be given to the inclusion of such measures in school performance tables in the light of that report.

Schools Access Initiative

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 5 November, Official Report, column 426, what financial provision she proposes to make in respect of the schools access initiative. [8053]

Mrs. Gillan: We are today announcing an extension of the schools access initiative. We will provide support totalling £12 million over the next three years for projects to make more mainstream schools accessible to pupils with disabilities. We shall encourage local education authorities and schools to seek local partnership funding to maximise the value of projects to be undertaken under the initiative.

Clinical Academic Salaries

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations she has received about changes in clinical academic salary levels. [8246]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has received numerous representations on this matter. She announced at the time of the Budget statement that she has placed a new condition of grant on the Higher Education Funding Council for England from 1997–98 requiring the council to enable universities and colleges to meet any additional costs for medical schools arising from any pay increase awarded by the Government to NHS clinicians.

Education and Community Values

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received regarding the consultation exercise conducted by the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority on values in education and community; and if she will make a statement. [8292]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend has received about 10 representations, mostly from people concerned that the distribution of questionnaires meant that the consultation was restricted. The questionnaires were distributed in accordance with prescribed samples. The School Curriculum and Assessment Authority has assured my right hon. Friend that it was at the same time open to anyone to ask for the consultation document and submit their views. SCAA will take account of all representations received to date.

Secondary School Funding

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each year from 1992 to 1996 (a) the total standard spending assessment for secondary schools, (b) this figure expressed as an amount per secondary pupil, (c) the amount spent on secondary pupils and (d) this figure expressed as an amount per pupil for the London borough of Hounslow. [8297]

Mr. Robin Squire: The following table shows for Hounslow local education authority secondary education (a) standard spending assessment and (b) SSA per pupil for the years 1992–93 to 1995–96; and (c) net institutional expenditure and (d) NIE per pupil in LEA schools for the years 1992–93 to 1994–95, the latest year for which outturn figures are available. All figures are in cash terms, and have not been adjusted for changes in function.

Hounslow LEA secondary education

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96

(b) SSA per pupil (£)	2,917	3,122	3,145	3,128
(c) NIE (£m)	33.383	29.530	32.691	n/a
(d) NIE per pupil (£)	2,419	2,282	2,582	n/a

Further Education Colleges (London)

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total allocation of funding from the Further Education Funding Council to colleges in the Greater London region in each year since 1993 in (a) cash prices and (b) current prices. [8412]

Mr. Paice: The total allocation of funding by the Further Education Funding Council to colleges in the Greater London region since 1993 is as follows:

	cash prices £ million	current prices £ million
1993–94	377.9	419.5
1994–95	396.7	422.7
1995–96	429.1	442.3
1996–97	427.1	427.1

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the level of funding per full-time equivalent student from the Further Education Funding Council for colleges in the Greater London region in each year since 1993 in current prices. [8413]

Mr. Paice: The Further Education Funding Council no longer funds colleges on the basis of full-time equivalent students.

Jobseeker's Allowance (Students)

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if her Department will establish a review of students on part-time courses and their eligibility for the jobseeker's allowance. [8523]

Mr. Forth: During the passage of the Jobseekers Bill we said that we would collect more and better information on the effectiveness and cost-effectiveness of the jobseeker's allowance rules on education and training. We are doing this. We are also considering this issue as part of the general JSA evaluation. In addition, on 6 November I announced the workskill pilots. These will evaluate new, more flexible arrangements for people to undertake employment-related education and training while receiving JSA. The pilots are due to start in April 1997 in four areas.

Teacher Training

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list, for each year since 1993–94 and up to 2001, the target and actual intake for initial teacher training in total, for (a) secondary, (b) primary and (c) secondary by subject, showing the percentage change between the target and actual intake and the revised targets for 1997–98; and if she will make a statement. [8609]

Mr. Forth: The following table shows the actual and target intakes to initial teacher training courses in England from 1993–94 to 1996–97 with target intakes for 1997–98 to 1999–2000.

Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total Government expenditure on national vocational qualifications, including Scottish vocational qualifications, in each year of their existence; if she will make a statement on the aims and objectives of the qualifications; and what research she has commissioned to examine the kinds of employment gained by people who gain national vocational qualifications. [8223]

Mr. Paice: Expenditure through the Department's programmes on development costs of national vocational qualifications between 1988 and March 1996 is £106 million. This figure includes £83 million from the standards programme and £23 million grant in aid to the National Council for Vocational Qualifications. For each year this is:

(£ million)

	1988–89	1989–90	1990–91	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Standards Programme	3	7	9	12	12	12	11	17
Grant in Aid	3.8	3	2.6	3.7	3.9	3.8	1.9	0
Total	6.8	10	11.6	15.7	15.9	15.8	12.9	17

The Department does not hold the information for Scottish vocational qualifications; this is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland. However, the development of occupational standards through the standards programme serves both NVQs and SVQs.

National vocational qualifications provide a clear system which defines employers' needs in terms of occupational competence, assesses that competence when it has been achieved, ensures individuals undertake relevant and meaningful training and enables employers to know who has met the standards.

NVQs are gained by many different categories of individual, including those already in employment in firms as well as those entering the labour market and unemployed. Information on the employment destinations of those on youth training and training for work, many of whom gain NVQs during their training, is regularly published by the Department. Recent research published by the Department has indicated that 42 per cent. of employers using NVQs gave pay rewards to employees gaining NVQs and 58 per cent. gave greater opportunities in terms of further training, priority in promotion or work opportunities involving higher pay.

GCSE League Tables (Error)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate she has made of the costs incurred in correcting the programming error in respect of a number of local education authorities' entries in the recent GCSE league tables; and if she will make a statement. [8358]

Mrs. Gillan [holding answer 10 December 1996]: None. Fewer than 10 LEAs are affected and corrections are being made under existing errata procedures.

School Rolls

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to ensure (a) the provision of new school places required by rising rolls and (b) the elimination of surplus places no longer required; and if she will make a statement. [7301]

Mr. Robin Squire: Section 14 of the Education Act 1996 places a duty on each local education authority to secure sufficient school places for its area unless the Secretary of State has made an order under section 27 of that Act, in which case the responsibility for providing sufficient school places may be shared with or held solely by the Funding Agency for Schools.

We look to local education authorities to take action to remove surplus places in the first instance. My right hon. Friend has powers under the Education Act 1996 to direct an authority to bring forward rationalisation proposals where numbers of surplus places appear excessive.

Both the provision of new places in areas of population growth and the cost-effective removal of surplus places are among our priority categories for capital support.

Sickness Absence

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many working days were lost through sickness by (a) teachers in England, (b) staff in the local education service and (c) staff in her Department in each of the last five years. [8616]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department for Education and Employment does not collect the information requested at (a) and (b).

The numbers of working days lost through sickness by staff in my Department from 1992 to 1995 are shown in the following table. Information prior to 1992 is not available.

	1992	1993	1994	1995
Former Department for Education (including Teachers' Pensions Agency)	20,368	20,966	13,926	—
Former Employment Department (excluding Employment Service)	71,953	80,620	62,266	—
DfEE	—	—	—	[1]72,857

[1] Includes data covering all staff in the former ED and DfEE up to the merger on 5 July 1995; and in the DfEE for the remainder of the year.

National Curriculum Publications

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many national curriculum publications have been sent by her Department to schools in England, in the academic years 1994–95 and 1995–96; if she will list them; which delivery service has been used; and what has been the cost. [8621]

Mrs. Gillan: The answer is confined to the national curriculum statutory documents which set out the mandatory programmes of study and attainment targets, since information on other documents bearing on the national curriculum could be assembled only at disproportionate cost. The figures include mailings to higher and further education establishments and local education authorities, as well as to schools, for which separate figures are not available. The great majority of mailings are to schools.

All figures are to the nearest thousand.

Academic year 1994–95

3,000 documents containing programmes of study and attainment targets for the National Curriculum as it stood before the Dearing review were issued through Christians, a commercial mailing house. The documents were "English in the National Curriculum", "Mathematics in the National Curriculum", "Science in the National Curriculum", "Technology in the National Curriculum", "History in the National Curriculum", "Geography in the National Curriculum", "Modern Foreign Languages in the National Curriculum", "Art in the National Curriculum", "Music in the National Curriculum", and "Physical Education in the National Curriculum".

In January and February 1995, a total of 774,000 documents containing programmes of study and attainment targets for the revised national curriculum were issued to all schools, higher and further education establishments and local education authorities in England through Prolog, a commercial mailing house. Up to August 1995 Christians issued a further 149,000. The revised national curriculum documents are "The National Curriculum", (covering all subjects at all key stages), "Key Stages 1 and 2 of the National Curriculum", "English in the National Curriculum", "Mathematics in the National Curriculum", "Science in the National Curriculum", "Design and Technology in the National Curriculum", "Information Technology in the National Curriculum", "History in the National Curriculum", "Geography in the National Curriculum", "Modern Foreign Languages in the National Curriculum", "Art in the National Curriculum", "Music in the National Curriculum", and "Physical Education in the National Curriculum".

Invoices for mailing house charges do not correspond exactly to the academic year. From June 1994 to August 1995 they totalled £298,000. The cost of printing revised national curriculum documents was £1,093,000.

Academic year 1995–96

Forty-five thousand documents for the revised national curriculum were issued through Christians. The total cost was £61,000 for mailing house charges only.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Public Defender Scheme

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will initiate a pilot public defender scheme in England. [7516]

Mr. Streeter: It is not our intention to pilot such a scheme.

Rights of Audience

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he plans to make an announcement about rights of audience of employed advocates. [7514]

Mr. Streeter: The application for rights of audience for employed solicitors in the higher courts is still being considered by the Lord Chancellor and the designated judges, in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990. They hope to be in a position to make an announcement in the new year.

Legal Education and Conduct (Report)

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct plans to publish its fifth annual report. [9010]

Mr. Streeter: The Lord Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct has today published its fifth annual report, and copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Seat Belts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many drivers have been prosecuted for allowing a child aged under 14 years to travel in a vehicle without wearing a seat belt or legal restraint in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8226]

Sir John Wheeler: The number of persons proceeded against for carrying a child aged under 14 years without a seat belt are set out in the list:

1991: 55

1992: 55

1993: 69

1994: 87

1995: 99.

Computerisation of penalties other than prosecutions commenced late 1995. For the period 20 October 1995 to 7 October 1996 a total of 35,016 "advice and warnings" were given and 2,211 fixed penalty notices issued for various seat belt offences.

Operation Road Safe has been running since March 1995 and included in its priorities is the wearing of seat belts in vehicles.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate how many (a) drivers, (b) front-seat passengers and (c) back-seat passengers have been (i) killed and (ii) injured as a result of not wearing a seat belt in a vehicle in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8228]

Mr. Moss: The information requested is set out in the following table:

	Drivers		Front-seat passengers		Back-seat passengers
Year	Killed	Injured	Killed	Injured	Killed	Injured
1991	14	165	5	95	8	214
1992	10	231	4	124	4	222
1993	10	252	2	138	3	503
1994	10	137	1	84	9	447
1995	6	148	3	109	7	390

These figures exclude fatalities and casualties where seat belt usage is not known.

The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland, in conjunction with the National Safety Council in Ireland, and with private sector sponsorship, launched a seat belt campaign on 14 October 1996 covering both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic.

Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide a breakdown of schools in Northern Ireland by the percentages which they attract from each of the major traditions in Northern Ireland. [971]

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 2 November 1996, c. 473–74]: The breakdown of schools in Northern Ireland by the percentage which they attract from each of the major traditions is given in the tables.

Electricity Interconnector

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the value to the Northern Ireland economy of an electricity interconnector with Scotland. [6678]

Mr. Ancram [holding answer 28 November 1996]: None. The proposed construction of an electricity interconnector is a matter for the private companies concerned, Northern Ireland Electricity plc and Scottish Power plc. I can say, however, that the interconnector of neighbouring electricity systems is in line with UK Government and EU policy and is a central feature of Northern Ireland's energy strategy.

TRANSPORT

Motorway Service Stations

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria are used to decide where service stations should be located on motorways; and which agency has responsibility for determining proposals for service stations. [8082]

Mr. Watts: Following a change of policy announced in 1992, it is now for the private sector rather than the Department of Transport to bring forward new motorway service areas. My Department's involvement is limited to ensuring that proposals are acceptable in spacing, safety and traffic terms, and that any MSA signed from the motorway provides a specified minimum range of facilities. MSAs remain subject to the same controls as any other development, and cannot proceed unless planning permission has been granted by the local planning authority or, in the event of an appeal, the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Aircraft Noise Limits

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he will take to enforce the noise limits due to be imposed at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted from 1 January 1997. [8083]

Mr. Bowis: On 6 December, the High Court ordered a stay on the introduction of the daytime noise limit of 94 dBA Lmax and the night-time noise limit of 87 dBA Lmax at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports until the determination of an application by the International Air Transport Association for judicial review of the decision announced by my noble Friend on 28 August. The decision to improve monitoring efficiency by resiting some of the existing monitors and adding new monitors and other matters in the announcement of 28 August are unaffected.

Road Signs

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the costs to British industry of inadequate and poor road signing. [8416]

Mr. Watts: There have been no recent studies of the effects nationally of road signing on British industry.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made on the effect of poor and inadequate road signing on road safety. [8420]

Mr. Bowis: The need for particular signs to be provided to maintain safety on trunk roads in England is considered on a case by case basis. Maintenance of the signs is carried out in accordance with the Highways Agency's code of practice for routine maintenance. The provision and maintenance of adequate signing on other roads are matters for the relevant highway authorities.

Aircraft Safety Standards

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those countries identified by the Federal Aviation Authority as not meeting International Civil Aviation Organisation standards. [8435]

Mr. Bowis: I refer to the reply my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) gave to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich on 26 March, Official Report, column 542.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange for press releases listing countries not meeting Internatinal Civil Aviation Organisation standards issued by the Federal Aviation Authority to be placed in the Library. [8436]

Mr. Bowis: No, this is not a matter for my Department.

Air Passenger Carriers' Liability

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those countries with an air passenger carriers' liability limit lower than the United Kingdom's. [8440]

Mr. Bowis: According to information provided by the European Commission, six European Union member states currently permit carriers licensed in their territory to operate international services with lower liability limits than the United Kingdom in respect of death or injury to their passengers: Austria, Belgium, Germany, Greece, Portugal and Spain.

Details of liability requirements in countries outside the Community are not currently available. However, the proposed EC regulation on air carrier liability in case of accidents would require a third country carrier operating to, from, or within the Community to provide passengers buying a ticket within a European Union member state with full details of its liability arrangements if these do not match the new Community standards.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the revised safety guidance currently in place following the fire in the channel tunnel; [8439]

(2) if he will publish the documents relating to the decision by the Channel Tunnel Safety Authority to relax the evacuation standard on the channel tunnel from 90 minutes to three hours; [8437]

(3) if he will place in the Library copies of the correspondence between Eurotunnel and the Channel Tunnel Safety Authority regarding the recent decision to reopen the channel tunnel. [8438]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 6 December, Official Report, columns 804–805. However, Eurotunnel issued a press notice on 9 December 1996 which summarises the main measures that were taken—both temporary and permanent—before a resumption of Eurostar and tourist shuttle services was authorised by the intergovernmental commission. I can confirm that the issues identified by Eurotunnel were those examined in detail by the safety authority. A copy of the press notice has been placed in the Library.

North-west Traffic Area Office

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 5 December, Official Report, column 723, on the north-west traffic area office, what will be the amount of the payment to cover dilapidations. [8423]

Mr. Bowis: Negotiations on the amount of dilapidations are in progress between our agents and the landlord. To date, no figure has been agreed.

Seat Belts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate how many (a) drivers, (b) front-seat passengers and (c) back-seat passengers have been (i) killed and (ii) injured as a result of not wearing a seat belt in a vehicle in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8229]

Mr. Bowis: Statistics for seat belt wearing are available only until 1993 and only for the occupants of cars and vans. The position of front and back-seat passengers is available only for car passengers. The following table shows the recorded numbers of such drivers and passengers killed and injured in Great Britain while not wearing a seat belt whether or not one was fitted. The table does not include figures for the casualties where the wearing of a belt was not reported—about a quarter of all accidents.

	1991		1992		1993
	Killed	Injured	Killed	Injured	Killed	Injured
Car or van drivers	209	3,307	199	3,272	151	3,143
Car or van passengers	258	13,269	211	10,983	180	9,322
Front seat car passengers	57	1,367	52	1,428	55	1,379
Rear seat car passengers	176	11,194	142	8,985	119	7,481
All van passengers	25	708	17	570	6	462

It is known how many of these casualties were as a direct result of not wearing a seat belt, but it is estimated that 510 lives and 8,800 serious injuries have been saved each year as a result of seat belts being worn.

Roads Programme

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria have been altered to amend the decisions made in the 1995 review of the road programme in respect of the removal of schemes from the main programme and the promotion of schemes from the longer-term programme. [8617]

Mr. Watts: Since the review published in November 1995 as "Managing the Trunk Road Programme", the Government's Green Paper "Transport—The Way Forward", Cm 3234, has been published affecting the Government's view of priorities and there have been changes in the circumstances of individual schemes. In some cases, schemes have been reviewed to reduce their cost and scope; in some cases, costs and benefits have been updated; there has been public consultation on some schemes; some schemes have been taken forward as part of the design, build, finance and operate programme; and, in some cases, local circumstances have changed.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in respect of each of the schemes remaining in the road programme and for each scheme removed from the programme, what is the latest figure available on the ratio between current traffic and the critical traffic flow on that link and when the CTF ratio exceeded 100 per cent. or is forecast to exceed 100 per cent. [8619]

Mr. Watts: I will write to the hon. Member with details and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the appraisal methodology used to determine which trunk road improvements will (a) remain and (b) cease to be part of the road programme. [8368]

Mr. Watts: Decisions on which schemes should be included within the £6 billion road programme announced by my right hon. Friend on 26 November were taken in the light of a number of factors for each scheme, including the benefit to cost ratio, the environmental impact, the importance of the route on which the scheme was situated, the perceived importance of the scheme in the region, the actual or potential statutory or generalised blight generated by the scheme and the time at which the unimproved road was likely to experience substantial congestion. Longer-term schemes, for many of which little detailed information was yet available, were mostly withdrawn.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the regional priorities for road schemes given by the Government offices as part of the latest review of the road programme. [8365]

Mr. Watts: No. These were prepared for the purpose of the Department's internal consideration of policy options and were only one of a range of factors taken into account in reaching decisions on the content of the road programme.

Traffic Cones and Road Signs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (i) traffic cones and (ii) road signs have been stolen in the last year; at what cost; what plans his Department has to try to reduce such figures; and if he will make a statement. [8316]

Mr. Watts: Traffic management at roadworks is provided under contract and it is the contractor's responsibility to take action to prevent theft of his equipment. No central record is kept of thefts of traffic cones or temporary road signs. We are not aware of any cases of theft of permanent road signs on the trunk road network. I understand that some local highway authorities have experienced problems and are dealing with them. This is a matter for the authorities concerned.

A1

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what impact the decision to cease the upgrading of the A1 south of Alconbury and north of Peterborough will have on the concession awarded for the upgrading by DBFO—design, build, finance and operate—of the Alconbury to Peterborough section; and what representations he has received from the concessionaires on the decision. [8367]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Roy Hughes, dated 11 December 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question about changes made to the Government's trunk road programme following the Chancellor's Autumn Statement. You ask what implication there might be for the A1(M) Alconbury to Peterborough Design, Build, Finance and Operate (DBFO) scheme in the light of the decision taken to withdraw other A1(M) schemes from the programme.

The A1(M) Alconbury to Peterborough DBFO concession has been awarded as part of the Government's Private Finance Initiative (PFI). One of the key objectives for any contract awarded under the PFI initiative is to achieve the optimal transfer of risk to the private sector in relation to the design, building, financing and operation of roads. For the tenderer, this means that he makes his own assessment of future traffic and accepts any associated risks. For the Department, this means that concessions will only proceed where the level of risk transferred is acceptable to the Government and represents good value for money. Any possible implications, therefore, for the A1(M) Alconbury to Peterborough DBFO concession following changes to the trunk road programme, are entirely a matter for the DBFO Company.

To date, no approach has been received from the DBFO Company on this matter.

Cones Hotline

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what final estimate he has made of the (a) average daily and (b) total gross cost to all the Departments and agencies involved in the national cone hotline; and if he will make a statement. [8313]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave him on 26 March 1996, Official Report, column 547, and on 10 July 1995, Official Report, column 403, and to the letter the chief executive of the Highways Agency wrote to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 6 November 1995, Official Report, columns 759–60.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many calls to the national cone hotline (a) were made and (b) required remedial action to be taken; and if he will make a statement. [8314]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the letter the chief executive of the Highways Agency wrote to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 6 November 1995, Official Report, columns 759–60.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which other countries in the (a) EU and (b) Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Department have begun operating a system similar to the national cone hotline (i) prior to, (ii) during and (iii) after the British initiative; and if he will make a statement. [8315]

Mr. Watts: In France, the Centre National d'Information Routiere operates an information line service, providing motorists with information on road conditions and the opportunity to make complaints relating to the road network. We do not have readily available details of the systems operating in other EU and OECD countries, or of the dates on which other countries' systems started.

Injury Prevention and Control

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has signed the Melbourne declaration on injury prevention and control, adopted on 22 February. [8645]

Mr. Bowis: No.

Shipping

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many United Kingdom-owned and registered ships there were in each year since 1979.[7838]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 9 December 1996]: Information on United Kingdom-owned and registered ships alone was not available prior to 1986. The information that is available is as follows:

United Kingdom owned and registered fleet

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the markers associated with vehicle data stored on the police national computer indicating when such markers are used. [7554]

Mr. Maclean: Details of markers associated with vehicle data stored on the police national computer cannot be divulged since to do so may be prejudicial to the prevention and detection of crime and the security of the state.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the markers associated with criminal record data stored on the police national computer indicating when such markers are used. [7556]

Mr. Howard: The following types of marker may be held for subjects with criminal record data stored on the police national computer:

Warning Signals

Information Markers

Local Cross-References.

Warning signals contain information about the subject which should be immediately communicated to officers for the protection of themselves, the subject and others.

Information markers contain useful and operationally important information about the subject.

Local cross-references are used to identify the existence of information about a subject held on other police systems.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the data fields which are currently used in relation to vehicle information stored on the police national computer. [7553]

Mr. Maclean: The following data fields relating to the vehicles application are held on the police national computer:

- Vehicle Registration Mark (VRM);
- VRM previously allocated to the vehicle;
- The Vehicle Identification Number allocated by a manufacturer;
- Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority (DVLA) make/model/body/colour code;
- Engine serial number and capacity;
- Registered owner's name and address;
- Month and year of first registration in the United Kingdom and name of the Vehicle Registration Office;
- Number and layout of wheels;
- Vehicle history:
  - permanently exported;
  - scrapped or seriously damaged;
  - previous owner has indicated they no longer own the vehicle;
  - vehicle has been subject to a cherished transfer;
  - local authority has disposed of a vehicle;
  - vehicle is subject to direct/personal export regulations;
  - lost/stolen/recovered date;
  - date vehicle was scrapped;
  - VRM has been transferred to another vehicle;
  - date on which the registered keeper last changed;
  - date when vehicle description details were last updated.
- An indicator to show that the vehicle details are as notified by the previous owner;
- An indicator to show that the contents of the DVLA record have been queried;
- An indicator to show that the vehicle excise licence has been expired for more than three months;
- An indicator to show that the vehicle owner is entitled to diplomatic privilege;
- An indicator to show whether foreign or Great Britain registered;
- Owner/creator of the vehicle details which have been entered by the police (used when no DVLA information is available).

In addition, various reports may be added by the police service to a vehicle record for operational police use. The report types available are lost/stolen, found, information, restricted—so that information is not given out over the air, correction, seen and removed, into custody or from street to street.

Criminal Records

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the data fields currently used in relation to criminal record information stored on the police national computer. [7555]

Mr. Howard: The following data fields are held for subjects with criminal record information stored on the police national computer.

Subject-related details may contain the following:

- Name under which subject is filed;
- PNC Identification Number;
- Criminal Record Office Number;
- Date and place of birth and nationality;
- Descriptive details;
- Occupations;
- Names, nicknames and dates of birth used;
- Warning signals;
- Information markers;
- Local cross-references;
- Locations of subject photographs and dates taken;
- Police circulation references;
- Police officers with detailed or special knowledge of subject:
- Passport detail;
- Other identity numbers (eg National Insurance Number, Aliens Registration Number);
- Internal cross references to other PNC subjects;
- Driver number issued by Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority (DVLA);
- Known associates;
- Special skills and knowledge;
- Organisations with which subject is involved and type of relationship;
- Addresses and telephone numbers;
- Places frequented;
- Other details (any other relevant information on the subject);
- For each case the following information may be held;
- Arrest details, including date and time, prosecuting agent, fingerprint status, officer dealing with case, persons co-charged;
- Offences with which charged, including date and time, location, method used and clothing worn, whether committed while on bail;
- How, when and where the case was dealt with, e.g., conviction at court, caution at police station;
- For offences dealt with at court, the plea entered, adjudication, number of offences taken into consideration, sentence imposed, result of appeal;
- Remand appearance information including location, date, result, bail conditions and breaches of bail;
- Periods in custody including dates, institution and release details including date, reason, return/recall dates, licence conditions and supervision arrangements.

Fire Safety

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provision is made for reporting back to the joint fire safety committee of the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council by Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services on their involvement, (a) in those areas for which the fire and emergency planning department has a policy responsibility and (b) in liaison with other Government Departments, in the development of fire safety standards and tests. [7978]

Mr. Sackville: The joint fire safety committee of the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council meets twice a year and on an ad hoc basis as necessary to discuss matters of particular concern to the committee. Issues affecting fire safety standards and fire testing are reported to the committee during these meetings.

Asylum Division

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff and of what grades are employed in the Home Office asylum division; and what were the figures (a) on 1 January 1996, (b) on 1 January 1993, (c) on 1 January 1990 and (d) on 1 January 1988. [7792]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information available is given in the following table:

Grade	1988	1990	1 January 1993	1 January 1996	30 November 1996

[1] Indicates figures not available.

The asylum division, now directorate, was formed in April 1991. Before then, asylum determination staff were part of a division which also did other work, and the figures given for 1988 and 1990 represent the total number of staff dealing specifically with applications for asylum. No breakdown by grades of staff is available for those years.

French Fishermen (Minquiers)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Dpearmtent under what statutory provision French fishermen are permitted to fish in the Minquiers. [7764]

Mr. Sackville: The waters around the Minquiers form part of the territorial sea of Jersey. The Sea Fisheries (Jersey) Law 1994 permits continued fishing by French vessels in this area, in conformity with long-standing agreements between the British and French Governments.

CS Gas

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the value of the contingency fund that he has established to meet damages claims for injuries caused by CS gas to civilians and police officers. [8282]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend has not established such a fund.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make it his policy to incorporate the guidelines established by the Himsworth committee into authorisations given to United Kingdom police forces relating to the use of CS gas; [8280]

(2) what guidelines have been issued to United Kingdom police forces concerning the operational use of CS gas canisters; [8284]

(3) if the authorisation granted to United Kingdom police forces to use CS gas extends to members of the special constabulary; [8281]

(4) if guidelines issued by his Department to local police forces regarding the use of CS gas are legally binding. [8285]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend has not issued guidelines on the use of CS spray. The Association of Chief Police Officers has issued operational guidance, which is not legally binding. Individual police officers must comply with the criminal law in relation to any use of force. The Himsworth report's conclusions and recommendations were fully taken into account in the decision to adopt CS spray, and are reflected in the operational guidance, and in guidance to chief officers on the purchase of CS equipment. It is open to chief officers to issue special constables with CS spray.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the strength of the CS gas used in the United Kingdom relative to that used in the United States of America. [8283]

Mr. Maclean: The weight to volume concentration of CS currently used by police forces in England and Wales is 5 per cent. the same as in France. I understand that some law enforcement agencies in the United States of America have used sprays with 1 to 2 per cent. concentrations, but because of concerns about its effectiveness, many have moved to pepper sprays.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many CS sprays are being acquired by United Kingdom police forces; what is the country of origin of these devices; and which companies manufacture them. [8279]

Mr. Maclean: The figure requested is not centrally available A total of 3,800 officers carried CS spray canisters for the trials which took place in 16 forces in England and Wales between March and August this year. The canisters were manufactured by SAE Alsetex of France.

Closed Circuit Television

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of each of the CCTV schemes cited in his letter to hon. Members of 4 January; and what has been the reduction in the number of crimes in each case since the introduction of each scheme. [8239]

Mr. Maclean: The closed circuit television schemes cited are those in Newcastle upon Tyne, Swansea, Northampton, Gloucester and Bedford. None of these schemes was funded by the Home Office and details of their costs are not recorded centrally.

Local police forces have provided the following data:

Newcastle upon Tyne: The scheme became operational in December 1992. In the year before its installation, there were 12,400 recorded in the area covered by the cameras. In 1996, it is estimated that 7,000 crimes will be recorded.

Swansea: The system was installed in December 1994. In the 15 weeks before the system became operational, there were 1,544 instances of vehicle crime. In the 15 weeks after, there were 1,382 instances.

Gloucester: The system became operational in May 1993. After the cameras were installed, there was an 80 per cent. reduction in crimes of violence, a 78 per cent. reduction in commercial burglary and autocrime was virtually eradicated in car parks covered by CCTV.

Bedford: The system became operational in May 1994. In November 1993, there were 325 recorded crimes in the area covered by the cameras. In November 1996, there were 186.

Northampton: CCTV cameras have completely eradicated car crime in a local car park.

Child Abduction

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people have been arrested for attempted and actual baby snatching within the United Kingdom during the past two years in each region; and if he will make a statement; [8096]

(2) how many attempted baby snatches there have been during the past two years in each region. [8097]

Mr. Maclean: This information is not collected centrally.

Overseas Domestic Workers

Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Department what estimate he has made of the number of overseas domestic workers who have entered and worked in this country legally since 1980. [8080]

Mr. Kirkhope: Comprehensive information on domestic workers admitted to the United Kingdom is not available. The available information relates to persons granted entry clearance in 1995 by the 21 posts in the middle east and far east which are likely to deal with the vast majority of applications by domestic workers. In the whole of the year, there were some 14,000 entry clearances issued at these posts to domestic workers, the great majority to servants accompanying their employers on a visit to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of overseas domestic workers who have left their employers owing to abuse since 1980. [8081]

Mr. Kirkhope: No such estimate is available.

Green Goddesses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Green Goddesses his Department currently has; and what is the average age of the fleet. [8216]

Mr. Sackville: The Department currently holds 1,085 Green Goddesses.

The average age is about 42 years.

Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what meetings he or his officials have had with representatives of the retail industry and other sectors to discuss costs which may result from the proposed Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations. [8414]

Mr. Sackville: Officials met representatives of the British Retail Consortium on 1 August to discuss compliance costs associated with proposals for Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations. Since then, they have corresponded and spoken with representatives of that organisation on a number of occasions. Most recently, officials from the fire safety unit and Her Majesty's fire service inspectorate carried out cost assessment visits to workplaces with the BRC and Francis Maude, chairman of the Government's deregulation task force, on 26 November.

Representatives of other sectors were consulted as part of the consultative exercise carried out between 21 May and 9 August this year.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to implement the Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations; and what compliance costs have been estimated by his Department. [8415]

Mr. Sackville: Following an extensive consultation process, we intend to make regulations shortly. A compliance cost assessment will accompany the regulations.

Plastic Baton Rounds

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the police scientific development branch report, entitled "Plastic Baton Round Equipment for the Police", part 2, No. 6/90, is a classified document; and if he will place copies in the Library. [8650]

Mr. Maclean: This is a classified document and I will not place copies in the Library.

Science and Technology Group

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to place copies of all Home Office science and technology group reports in the Library. [8651]

Mr. Maclean: Copies of reports published by the former police department science and technology group, and its successor units within the police policy directorate, are placed in the Library where it is considered appropriate to do so, having regard to their subject matter and whether they are classified.

Bilingual Learners' Support

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what funding will be made available for bilingual learners' support in Hampshire after April 1997. [7087]

Mr. Kirkhope: The main source of specific funding for additional education support for members of ethnic minorities is grants paid by the Home Office under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966. Hampshire's grant allocation figure for 1996–97 is £527,554. I announced on 13 November, Official Report, column 242, that section 11 funding will continue at its present overall level until August 1998. We are currently in touch with Hampshire, Portsmouth and Southampton councils about detailed arrangements in the light of local government reorganisation from April 1997. In addition, the Department for Education and Employment currently has under consideration bids for its 1997–98 grants for education support and training programme which includes grants for in-service training to equip mainstream teachers and classroom assistants with skills needed to promote ethnic minority pupils' attainment of English. The outcome will be announced before Christmas.

Drug Dealers

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 2 December, Official Report, columns 471–72, (1) which three-month period of 1994 was used for his analysis; how many offenders were convicted of class A drug trafficking offences in each of the three months; how many of the offenders convicted in each month had one previous offence of class A drug trafficking; how many in each month had two previous offences of class A drug trafficking; and how many in each month had more than two offences; [7850]

(2) if he will list for (i) the period of the study and (ii) the number of offenders convicted for (a) a first offence, (b) a second offence, (c) a third offence and (d) a fourth or subsequent offence of trafficking in class A drugs, and, against each category for each month, (1) the number who received a custodial sentence and (2) the average length of sentence given to those sentenced to custody. [7928]

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 10 December, Official Report, columns 148–49.

Wiltshire Constabulary

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of (a) police officers, (b) full-time civilian staff, (c) part-time civilian staff and (d) contractors' staff employed by Wiltshire constabulary in (i) 1978, (ii) 1983, (iii) 1987, (iv) 1992 and (v) 1996. [8130]

Mr. Maclean: Information on numbers of contract staff is not held centrally. The numbers of police officers and civilians employed by Wiltshire constabulary are set out in the table:

Year[1]	Number of Police Officers	Number of Civilians Part-Time	Number of Civilians Full-Time
1978	962	227	44
1983	1,029	235	51
1987	1,044	311	69
1992	1,221	424	83
1996	1,219	414	92

[1] All figures taken at end of March.

Knives

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to provide the police with extra powers to arrest people found carrying a knife. [8364]

Mr. Maclean: Since 4 July 1996, the police have had the power to arrest a person found carrying a knife in a public place or on school premises. For the knife-carrying problem to be tackled effectively, we believe it is essential that the police have adequate powers to stop and search when they have reliable information that people are carrying knives. At present, a police officer may stop and search anyone if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that he will find stolen or prohibited articles, such as a knife. On 6 November, we announced our intention to amend the code of practice on stop and search powers, issued under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, to make it clear that reasonable suspicion includes intelligence that members of a group or gang habitually carry knives. We have also proposed that police powers should be extended so that they can stop and search anyone in a particular area if they reasonably believe that people are carrying knives in that area. Those powers would have to be authorised by an officer of at least inspector rank for a maximum period of 48 hours. The association of Chief Police Officers, the Police Superintendents Association and the Police Federation have all indicated that they would support the proposed new powers.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much his Department will spend on Christmas trees and decorations this year; how many Christmas trees will be bought for his Department's headquarters; and what are the type and country of origin of the trees; [7571]

(2) how much his Department plans to spend on celebrating Christmas and the new year. [7586]

Mr. Howard [holding answers 6 November 1996]: The full information requested is not held centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

It is expected that Home Office expenditure on official Christmas cards will be in the region of £2,000.

Most Christmas decorations are paid for privately by members of staff. One artificial tree has been purchased for the Home Office building in Queen Anne's Gate at a cost of £75. It is being used as a focal point for a Christmas challenge to members of the Home Office to undertake voluntary work in Westminster during the Christmas season.

Metropolitan Police (Vauxhall)

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for what reasons the plan to construct a divisional headquarters in Grafton square, Vauxhall, was not proceeded with; [8329]

(2) what plans the Metropolitan police have (a) to relocate and (b) to provide adequate modern accommodation on their present site for Vauxhall police division; [8330]

(3) what consultation has taken place within the borough of Lambeth regarding the proposed use of Grafton square as a criminal justice facility. [8331]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that a strategic review of the provision of police accommodation in Lambeth, particularly in Clapham and Streatham, indicated that to continue with plans for a divisional headquarters in Clapham would not represent the best use of public funds.

He considers a criminal justice facility would provide greater benefit to the area. The new criminal justice facility will free much-needed space in the other police stations within the borough of Lambeth, enabling local police managers to make better use of existing police buildings. I understand that Metropolitan police architects consulted the senior planning practitioner for the London borough of Lambeth. The plans were discussed at a meeting of the Clapham sector working group and details of the drawings and proposals were sent to three local councillors. A deputy assistant commissioner from the Metropolitan police also addressed a public meeting. The Commissioner tells me that the Metropolitan police have delayed their planning application to allow more time for residents to consider the proposals.

DEFENCE

Army Radio System

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his current estimate of the cost of the Bowman project; and what was the original estimated cost. [8350]

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the original estimated cost at today's prices of the Army's Bowman radio system; what is the current estimated cost of the Bowman system; what was the original in-service date; and what is the current estimated in-service date of the system; and if he will make a statement. [8464]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The original estimated cost of the Bowman project when the first stage of feasibility studies was approved in 1988 was £1.5 billion, which is equivalent to £2.1 billion at current prices. The current estimate of the cost of the Bowman project is £1.9 billion. The original estimated in-service date was December 1995. The current estimated in-service date is March 2002.

Low Flying

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last reviewed the Royal Air Force low flying strategy; and what were his conclusions. [8466]

Mr. Soames: The need for military low flying is kept under continual review. It remains our conclusion that low flying is an essential tactic for a modern air force and one of the most effective ways of penetrating hostile air defences.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much compensation has been paid to (a) individuals and (b) organisations for damage resulting from flying activity in the United Kingdom in the last 10 years.[8470]

Mr. Soames: It is not possible to differentiate between compensation payments made to individuals and those made to organisations without disproportionate effort. However, the majority of payments made were to individuals.

Information on the total amounts paid is readily available for the last eight financial years only. The amounts paid relating to activity in the United Kingdom, excluding operational flying in Northern Ireland, were:

1988–89: £432,000
1989–90: £414,000
1990–91: £427,000
1991–92: £440,000
1992–93: £506,000
1993–94: £558,000
1994–95: £703,000
1995–96: £374,000.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints his Department received about low-flying aircraft in each month of each of the last four years and to date this year. [8471]

Mr. Soames: The numbers of inquiries and complaints received by my Department about military low flying by month between January 1992 and January 1996 have been provided in answers given to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) on 5 May 1993, Official Report, column 146, 16 February 1994, Official Report, column 818, 19 October 1995, Official Report, column 346, and 13 February 1996, Official Report, column 490. The numbers received from February 1996 onwards are as follows:

Month	England	Wales	Scotland
February	210	55	79
March	198	36	98
April	236	72	92
May	372	92	162
June	411	71	100
July	614	135	148
August	714	183	167
September	470	115	119
October	453	36	141
November	297	49	76

The figures exclude Northern Ireland, where most low flying is of an operational nature with only a limited number of training sorties. Complaints arising from this activity are dealt with locally, and no central record is available of the number received.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates on which military aircraft engaged in low flying exercises have crashed since January 1992. [8472]

Mr. Soames: The dates of all crashes involving British military aircraft engaged in low flying either in the UK or overseas during the period in question are listed in the table. Details of which of these aircraft were involved in exercises are not recorded separately.

Nuclear Submarines (Disposal)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the disposal of the redundant nuclear submarine hulks berthed at Rosyth; what plans he has to dispose of them on land; what options he has evaluated for the dismantling and disposal of the radioactive reactors; and if he will make a statement. [8461]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) yesterday, Official Report, column 158.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the decisions taken on the deployment of nuclear weapons in new NATO states at the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe meeting in Lisbon on 2 December. [8291]

Mr. David Davis: I have been asked to reply.

No such decisions were taken at the Lisbon Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe summit.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Law of the Sea Convention

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the United Kingdom plans to accede to the UN convention on the law of the sea. [8253]

Dr. Liam Fox: It is our intention that the United Kingdom will accede to the United Nations convention on the law of the sea in due course. Parliament will be told as soon as the Government have taken a decision.

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom is required to accede to the UN convention on the law of the sea by the beginning of March in order to retain its right to a representative on the Commission on limits to the continental shelf. [8256]

Dr. Fox: Any state which has deposited an instrument of ratification or accession to the United Nations convention on the law of the sea on or before 5 February 1997 may nominate a candidate for election to the Commission on the limits of the continental shelf. The UK has not done so. No state has the right to a representative.

Gold Reserves (Hong Kong)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 27 November, Official Report, column 308, what is the current value in pounds sterling of (a) the Hong Kong Government's gold reserves and (b) all other assets of the Hong Kong exchange fund. [8518]

Mr. Hanley: The current value of the Hong Kong Government gold reserves, held in the exchange fund, is about £15 million. The total assets of the exchange fund, excluding the gold reserves, as at end November 1996 amounted to about £39.5 billion.

Ministerial Visit (Cyprus)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he plans to visit Cyprus; if he will meet the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot leaders; where he will stay overnight; and if he will make a statement. [8334]

Mr. David Davis: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will visit Cyprus on 16 and 17 December and will overnight in Nicosia. We cannot give further details for security reasons. During the visit he will meet President Clerides, Foreign Minister Michaelides and the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community, Mr Rauf Denktash. Discussion will focus on the prospects of achieving a comprehensive, negotiated settlement of the Cyprus problem in 1997, before European Union accession negotiations begin.

Council of Ministers Working Group

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will name all the working groups of the European Union Council of Ministers that deal with questions of security, defence and arms control; what is the specific remit of each group and how often they meet; and if he will list the work in progress in those groups, in which the British Government participates. [8618]

Mr. David Davis: A number of working groups deal with security, defence and arms control issues. They comprise: non-proliferation, covering nuclear, chemical and biological fields; conventional arms exports; armaments policy; global disarmament and arms control. They meet regularly to discuss topical issues and areas for co-operation including, for example, the recent joint action on anti-personnel land mines. The common foreign and security policy group and Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe group also consider European security issues.

Arms Embargoes

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will list the instances where (a) United Nations or (b) European Union arms embargoes have not been immediately incorporated into the law of Britain's offshore dependencies; and what was the reason for that non-incorporation; [8624]

(2) what arrangements currently exist for the incorporation of (a) United Nations arms embargoes and (b) European Union arms embargoes into the law of the United Nations offshore dependencies; [8623]

(3) on what date the interdepartmental committee set up to examine the Government's procedures in relation to the trafficking of arms will complete its report; and when a full report will be presented to the House; [8625]

(4) what measures he has taken to prevent United Kingdom nationals or companies from supplying arms and military equipment via a third country to a destination to which such exports are prohibited under (a) a United Nations and (b) a European Union arms embargo; [8626]

(5) what arrangements currently exist for the incorporation of (a) United Nations arms embargoes and (b) European Union arms embargoes into United Kingdom national law. [8622]

Mr. David Davis: As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary told the House on 27 November, Official Report, column 318, the Government have set up an interdepartmental committee to examine our procedures in relation to trafficking in arms and to determine whether there has been a gap in our controls and if so what action needs to be taken. The committee's terms of reference are as follows:

To review Government controls and procedures relating to trafficking in arms from third countries to destinations subject to embargo by the UK, when this is arranged from the UK or is arranged overseas by UK nationals or by UK companies;

To determine whether there are any gaps in controls and procedures, and if so, what action needs to be taken, and to consider whether the Government should have additional powers;

For the proposes of the review, the UK shall be taken to include Crown Dependencies and Dependent Territories;

To report by Thursday 19 December 1996.

The committee is examining the scope and implementation of all current UN, OSCE, EU and national embargoes, including their application in the dependent territories and Crown dependencies. The committee will cover the issues raised by the hon. Member as fully as possible in the time available. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will report to the House as early as possible.

General Affairs Council

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will report on the outcome of the General Affairs Council. [8723]

Mr. David Davis: All but three of the 25 A points in document 12425/96, which will be placed in the House as soon as it is available, were approved. The Dutch placed parliamentary scrutiny reserves on three items: stepping up the fight against organised crime; achievements in the field of justice and home affairs; and a draft report to the European Council on drugs. They expect to be able to lift all three of the reserves enabling them to be adopted before the European Council in Dublin on 13 and 14 December.

The Council noted the resolutions adopted by the European Parliament listed in document 11428/96. A copy of the document will be placed in the House as soon as it is available. The presidency drew attention to a resolution changing the European Parliament's rules of procedure requiring the Council to express an opinion on the Commission's annual work programmed and the Parliament's subsequent resolution on priorities for the year ahead. The Council agreed that this encroached on the Council's competence and that the presidency should write to the European Parliament to restate the Council's position that it did not feel itself duty bound by an obligation imposed unilaterally by the parliament.

The presidency informed the Council about the timing and agenda at the European Council in Dublin on 13 and 14 December.

The Council discussed a presidency proposal on an approach for the future trade regime for the mid-term review of the Council decision on the Association of Overseas Countries and Territories—October. Ministers were unable to reach agreement. The Council concluded that OCT should be discussed further by the Committee of Permanent Representatives with a view to reaching agreement before the end of the year.

The Council noted the approach outlined by the Commission in a short presentation given by Sir Leon Brittan on the upcoming EU–US summit which is being held in Washington on 16 December.

After hearing a report from the Commission, the Council agreed conclusions on EU relations with Switzerland. It confirmed that considerable progress had been made in various sectors and in particular in regard to the free movement of persons. While recognising that a number of technical issues remain to be resolved at expert level, the Council expressed the view that it should now be possible to proceed to the finalisation of these negotiations. The Council also expressed the hope that a rapid conclusion of the land transport agreement based on a set of common principles could be achieved. The Council also underlined the importance of the global nature of the negotiations and the need for a balance between the different sectors and a parallel shouldering of commitments in accordance with the directives approved in 1994.

The sixth EEA Council took place at the end of the morning and over lunch.

The Commission outlined its humanitarian plan for the great lakes region in Zaire. The Council encouraged the Commission to present the plan as soon as possible. There was some discussion of the need for military intervention in the support of humanitarian activities. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs commented that the British Government remain committed to the humanitarian effort in the region, but until there is clear evidence to suggest that military intervention would help the humanitarian effort, the British Government remain unconvinced of the need for deployment of a full multi-national force.

The Council had an exchange of views on Belarus, in the light of the troika's meeting with President Lukashenko in Lisbon on 3 December. The Council reiterated its deep concern about the democratic legitimacy and constitutionality of the Belarus referendum and new constitution. It decided to propose to the Belarusian authorities the sending of a European Union fact-finding mission.

Financial assistance to Turkey under the MEDA regulation was discussed over coffee.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs debriefed the Council, at the request of the presidency, on the London peace implementation conference. He noted that, while good progress had been made, the conference had realistically identified the huge amount still to be done. The Council welcomed the successful conclusion of the London peace implementation conference. It recognised the symbolic significance of the presence of all the leaders of Bosnia and Herzegovina at the conference. The Council reaffirmed the European Union's commitment to, and support for, the consolidation of peace, reconstruction and the return of refugees, notably through its regional approach. The Council expressed its deep concern at the current developments in the former republic of Yugoslavia and called for adherence to democracy and the rule of law, respect for human rights and democratic principles. The Council underlined that this would be a factor in the development of closer relations between the European Union and the former Republic of Yugoslavia in the context of the application of the regional approach.

The Council welcomed the successful conclusion of negotiations with the Palestinians on a new interim association agreement as an important step in strengthening their relations with the European Union. It looked forward to the early signature following the planned initialling by the Commission on 10 December.

The Commission proposed 20 mecu assistance for Bulgaria through the PHARE programme as part of a concerted international effort. Detailed proposals would be put to the PHARE management committee.

Foreign Ministers held a conclave to discuss the intergovernmental conference. The Irish presidency presented the draft revised treaty outline, which the Florence European Council had requested and which was placed in the House Libraries on 5 December. Ministers were able to give their first reactions to the document in preparation for the Dublin European Council discussion on 13 and 14 December. The Foreign Ministers' meeting was preceded by the normal briefing session with the European Parliament.

The conference of the representatives of the Governments of the member states agreed that the seat of the Community plant variety office will be in Angers, France.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Irradiated Food

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the tonnage of food that is irradiated and available for sale in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [8020]

Mrs. Browning: Under the Food (Control of Irradiation) Regulations 1990 a licence holder is required to keep a record of food treated by ionising radiation.

Returns received show that approximately 25 tonnes of herbs and spices have been irradiated in the UK since 1994. All this was indented for export.

EU Fish Stocks

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if equal access for each member state to the EU's fish stocks will apply from 1 January 2003. [8301]

Mr. Baldry: At present member states do not enjoy equal access to EU fish stocks. There are restrictions on access within coastal waters and areas such as the Shetland box and Irish box. The principle of equal access is further overlaid in practice by other elements of the common fisheries policy including the operation of quotas under relative stability and the ceilings on effort in Western waters.

Under Council regulation (EEC) No. 3760/92 the Council has to decide before 31 December 2002 on any necessary adjustments to be made to the present arrangements. The Government are committed to opposing changes to introduce equal access.

Fishing (Poland)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact on the United Kingdom fishing fleet of Poland joining the EU. [8302]

Mr. Baldry: Negotiations for the further enlargement of the European Union are not scheduled to start until after the conclusion of the intergovernmental conference. Any possible impact of Polish accession on the UK fishing fleet will depend on the accession terms proposed which will be discussed in full with the industry before the Government determined their fisheries objectives for the negotiations.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

European Energy Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the matters discussed and decisions taken at the European Energy Council on 3 December, indicating which items were subject to votes and how the United Kingdom voted; and if he will place in the Library copies of the documents tabled at the meeting. [8255]

Mr. Page: In answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question I refer to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconfield (Mr. Smith), Official Report, column 30. There were no formal votes taken at the Council. The majority of the proposals and reports have been deposited in the Library of both Houses and will appear in the Official Journal of the European Communities. These and other matters discussed at the Council are reported in a Council secretariat press release which is also placed in the Libraries of the House.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to change the time scale over which nuclear power stations are to be decommissioned. [8050]

Mr. Page: Decommissioning of a nuclear power station is a matter for the operator, taking into account the requirements of the regulatory authorities. This includes details of timing.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the number of industrial tribunal cases heard, the number of unfair dismissal cases heard at industrial tribunals and the number and percentage of unfair dismissal cases that were successful, by region, in each of the last 10 years. [7954]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is in the table:

Offshore Oil and Gas Installations

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 31 October, Official Report, column 184, on environmental inspections of oil rigs, what were the costs in each year of the oil installation inspections; and if he will place copies of the reports in the Library. [7931]

Mr. Page: As stated in that reply, figures for the numbers of inspections are not available apart from at disproportionate cost. Therefore, the costs incurred as a result of carrying out these inspections are also not available.

As files are not available, and reports may contain commercially sensitive information, copies of inspection reports will not be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what type of oil spill containment and treatment is available, and within what time span, for spills or seepages that may occur near or at the North sea and north Atlantic oil and gas platforms and depots. [7893]

Mr. Page: All oil and gas operators are required to have an oil spill contingency plan approved by my Department. In areas which are within 25 miles of the coast or are otherwise environmentally sensitive a more stringent plan for each well may be required, as may be an environmental impact assessment. These requirements are the "essential elements" and form part of the licence conditions of certain blocks. Indicative conditions are available in the Library of the House.

Telephones

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate for each of the last five years of (a) the number of households with a telephone and (b) those without by socio-economic category. [8447]

Mr. Ian Taylor: We have made no such estimate. However, figures from the family expenditure survey suggest the following:

in 1991 88.0 per cent. of households had a telephone;

in 1992 88.4 per cent. of households had a telephone;

in 1993 89.6 per cent. of households had a telephone;

in 1994–95 91.1 per cent. of households had a telephone;

in 1995–96 92.4 per cent. of households had a telephone.

We do not have figures for each of the last five years on the number of houses without a phone by socio-economic category. However, the results of the general household survey 1994 "Living in Britain" revealed that for households, the head of which was economically active, the proportion without a phone was 7 per cent. For households with economically inactive heads 12 per cent. were without a phone. A breakdown of these figures into socio-economic sub-groups is given in the survey, which is available in the Library of the House and which reveals interesting spending priorities within the categories.

Wages Councils

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent assessment he has made of the consequences of the abolition of the wages councils for wages in those industries previously covered by them. [7083]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Changes in earnings in particular industries reflect the varying conditions in those industries and it is not possible to attribute such changes to any particular event. Between April 1994 and April 1995, average earnings of full-time workers covered by the main wages councils before their abolition in August 1993 rose at a comparable rate to those of workers employed in other industries.

British Airways and American Airlines

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the President of the board of Trade what assessment he has made of the advantages and disadvantages of the proposed British Airways-American Airlines alliance (a) for the United Kingdom and (b) for other United Kingdom carriers. [8180]

Mr. John M. Taylor: On Friday 6 December my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced that he was seeking from the alliance undertakings in lieu of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. He made it clear that without suitable undertakings the alliance would be likely to lead to a significant loss of actual and potential competition.

The text of the competition analysis under European competition law is being made available to interested parties as from Friday 13 December 1996. I will arrange for a copy of this to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Balance of Trade

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the non-oil balance of trade in goods for the United Kingdom with the European Union in each year since 1979. [7830]

Mr. Page [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The information is given in the table.

Fuel Prices

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the average pump price per litre of (a) petrol and (b) diesel in each year since 1979–80. [7824]

Mr. Page [holding answer 6 December 1996]: The average pump price of four star petrol, premium unleaded petrol, and diesel fuel for the calendar years 1979 to 1995, and the first 10 months of 1996, including all taxes, is given in the table.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8537]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 10 December 1996]: For appointments made during 1995 I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Dr. Wright) on 25 April 1996, Official Report, column 219. From 1 January 1996 until 6 December 1996 departmental records show that five appointments to four separate bodies were made from names first supplied by the public appointments unit. A list of the appointments is as follows:

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Christopher Campbell

Coal Authority

Mr. John Cunliffe (reappointment)

Copyright Appeals Tribunal

Mrs. Angela Howorth (reappointment)

Sir Michael Lickiss (reappointment)

Human Genetics Advisory Commission

Prof. Cairns Aitken.

SCOTLAND

Public Appointments

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many appointments to non-departmental public bodies his Department has made in each of the last five financial years; [6366]

(2) if he will list, for each of the non-departmental public bodies under the jurisdiction of his Department, how many appointments his Department is entitled to make to these bodies; how many of these appointments will require to be made during the next (a) six and (b) 18 months; and of how many of its appointees his Department has extended the period of office during the last 12 months. [6367]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is shown in the table. This excludes appointments to advisory NDPBs, tribunals, and so on, which it would not be possible to cover except at disproportionate cost.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the amount of landfill tax raised from waste collection authorities in Scotland for the fiscal years (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [6827]

Mr. Kynoch: Based on their returns of household waste sent to landfill in 1994, the most recent date for which statistics are available, Scottish local authorities might be expected to face a landfill tax liability for £17 million in 1997–98. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has offset the charge on business overall by the reduction in national insurance contributions announced in his Budget last year. Scottish local authorities will benefit from this reduction.

It is not possible to estimate a figure of liability for the past year 1996–97.

Water Authorities

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much the (a) West, (b) North and (c) East of Scotland water authorities spent during their shadow period. [7427]

Mr. Kynoch: Between 17 July 1995 and 31 March 1996, the Scottish water authorities received grant in aid totalling (a) £3.211 million in the west, (b) £3.486 million in the north, and (c) £3.270 million in the east.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions have taken place between officers and Ministers of his Department and the West of Scotland water authority in relation to the construction of a sewage treatment works at Greenan; and what was the content of these discussions. [7426]

Mr. Kynoch: There have been no such discussions.

Overseas Travel (Diseases)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of rare and tropical diseases related to overseas travel have been diagnosed in each of the last five years in each health board area in Scotland. [7528]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information is not collected routinely under the category of "rare and tropical diseases". The information given in the table relates to laboratory-confirmed cases of diseases known to be of tropical origin and to cases where the disease is likely to have been of tropical origin.

Seat Belts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) drivers and (b) passengers have been prosecuted for not wearing seat belts in the (i) front seats and (ii) back seats of vehicles in Scotland in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8236]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information available in relation to the prosecution of seat belt offences is as follows:

Number of prosecutions for seat belt offences, Scotland, 1990 to 1994

Year	Number of prosecutions
1990	1,892
1991	2,193
1992	2,689
1993	3,580
1994	4,022

Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) cases and (b) deaths from MRSA have been recorded in (i) hospitals and (ii) the community in Scotland in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8317]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The number of cases of MRSA reported to the Scottish Centre for Infection and Environmental Health by laboratories throughout Scotland for each year since 1991 is given in the following table. It is not possible to distinguish between cases identified in hospitals and in the community.

Year	Number of cases
1991	432
1992	464
1993	442
1994	464
1995	600

Deaths due to MRSA do not have a distinct code within the revision of the international classification of diseases for encoding death registration data. Consequently, there are no centrally held statistics on deaths from MRSA.

Injury Prevention and Control

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department has signed the Melbourne declaration on injury prevention and control, adopted on 22 February. [8641]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The authors of the Melbourne declaration have not sought the Government's endorsement, although it has been brought to my right hon. Friend's attention. Accident prevention was identified as a health priority in the policy statement "Scotland's Health—A Challenge To Us All", published in 1992.

Public Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of the individuals appointed by his Department to public positions in the last year were first identified by the public appointments unit. [8546]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 10 December 1996]: The Scottish Office maintains its own public appointments list and therefore makes limited use of names from the public appointments unit. The Scottish Office public appointments list is used as a source of names of suitably qualified candidates for consideration for a wide range of appointments made by my right hon. Friend. From time to time, the public appointments unit passes names to the Scottish Office for the public appointments list, and vice versa. No central records are kept of the sources of names of those who are appointed to public bodies.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners' Incomes

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioner households there were in which three quarters or more of the total income was derived from national insurance retirement and similar pensions and housing and other benefits in supplement to or instead of such pensions in each of the last five financial years. [6589]

Mr. Heald: The information is in the table.

Calendar Year	Number of Pensioners Units
1988	3,750,000
1989	3,750,000
1990	3,500,000
1992	3,500,000
1993	3,600,000

Notes:

1. The pensioners' incomes series gives estimates for pensioner units. A pensioner unit is defined as being either a single person over state pension age or a couple where the man is over state pension age (SPA).

2. Income from state benefits has been calculated as income from national insurance benefits and all other benefits that may be received above SPA, such as income related benefits and disability benefits.

Source:

The source of these estimates is the pensioners' incomes series, which is based mainly on data from the family expenditure survey carried out over calendar years and covers the whole of the United Kingdom. The figures given are for the last five calendar years for which pensioners' incomes series data are available, and rounded to the nearest 50,000.

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he plans to publish new information on pensioners. [8933]

Mr. Heald: The "Pensioners' Income Series 1994/5" will be published by the Government Statistical Service at 9.30 am on 12 December. Copies will be available in the Library.

Mortgage Interest Payments

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of (a) the cost and (b) the numbers gaining if the linking period for mortgage interest payments was extended from 12 weeks to 26 weeks. [6732]

Mr. Roger Evans: No such estimate has been made and one could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

War Pensions

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 30 October, Official Report, columns 160–61, if he will give a breakdown of the illnesses and diseases for which the successful claimants received a war pension; and when his Department finished compiling the final report of this special exercise. [6975]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table and relates to cases reviewed under the special exercise.

Information on the new claims made as a result of the press notice could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The special exercise was completed on 3 February 1987.

In some instances awards of war pension were made to an individual in respect of more than one disability.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library the consultation papers presented to the Central Advisory Committee on War Pensions. [8666]

Mr. Heald: A copy of the consultation letter of 26 November to the members of the Central Advisory Committee on War Pensions has been placed in the Library. The letter gives full details of the proposed changes and invites comments from the committee by 17 January next year.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library the correspondence between himself and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury concerning proposals on war pensions. [8668]

Mr. Heald: Interministerial correspondence is not normally placed in the Library.

Data Matching

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he made of data matching arrangements in other countries in formulating his recent legislative proposals. [7741]

Mr. Heald: The proposals set out in the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Bill for extending checks of relevant data are based on the success of the Department's generalised matching service in identifying fraud. This was developed with the help and expertise of civil servants seconded from the privacy, fraud and control division of the Department of Social Security in Australia, with which there is continuing contact and co-operation.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the amount which will be saved as a result of the changes to housing benefit introduced in the Budget. [8573]

Mr. Roger Evans: It is estimated that the proposed changes would save £8 million in 1997–98, £60 million in 1998–99 and £92 million in 1999–2000.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what was the total housing benefit budget in each of the previous five years; [8567]

(2) how much has been paid out in housing benefit for each of the previous five years. [8566]

Mr. Evans: The information is set out in the table.

Housing benefit is a benefit based on legal entitlement and is not subject to a budget or cash limit.

Year	£ millions
1990–91	5,147
1991–92	6,482
1992–93	7,901
1993–94	9,218
1994–95	10,181

Source:
Table 3, departmental report 1996.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if new claims for housing benefit for single people will be subject to the new rules introduced in the Budget when that person has previously claimed housing benefit within the last year. [8569]

Mr. Evans: A single person who had his claim assessed under the local reference rent rules will be affected by the new rules if he renews his claim after the new rules come into force. Most people who have claimed in the last year who are exempt from the local reference rent rules will also be exempt from the new rules.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of people who will (a) be affected and (b) have their benefit reduced by the changes to housing benefit introduced in the Budget. [8574]

Mr. Evans: The number of people who are likely to be affected as a result of restricting housing benefit to the local reference rent is estimated as 370,000. Of these, 40,000 are likely to have reduced benefit in the first year with 133,000 and 214,000 having reduced benefit in subsequent years.

The number of people who are likely to be affected as a result of restricting housing benefit for most single people under 60 years of age is estimated as 365,000. Of these, 72,000 are likely to have reduced benefit in the first year with 210,000 and 265,000 having reduced benefit in subsequent years.

However, the proposals will overlap and the numbers likely to have a reduction in their benefit over the next three years are 92,000, 275,000 and 370,000.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what safeguards exist in the changes to housing benefit in the budget to prevent unemployed people who are widowed or divorced and left with the tenancy of the house they previously shared with a partner from losing their homes. [8572]

Mr. Evans: There are special rules within the housing benefit regulations which give protection to those who lose their partner through death. There is also protection for those who lose their jobs. Generally, widows will be able to retain the level of benefit which was being paid before the late husband's death, for a period of 12 months. These special rules will continue to apply when the proposed changes are implemented even though claimants, over the age of 59, would not be affected by the single room rent proposals. There is no separate protection for divorced people. However, local authorities will continue to have discretion to pay up to the full rent to prevent exceptional hardship.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently claiming housing benefit in the United Kingdom. [8568]

Mr. Evans: At the end of May 1996, there were 4,779,000 housing benefit recipients in Great Britain.

I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for the Northern Ireland figure.

Note:
A recipient may be a single person or a couple.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many single person households have been in receipt of housing benefit in each of the last five years. [8570]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

The information relates to housing benefit recipients in all tenure types, in Great Britain, who are single with no dependants in the household.

Year	Housing benefit recipients (000s)
May 1991	2,346
May 1992	2,411
May 1993	2,562
May 1994	2,645
May 1995	2,702

Residential Home Allowances

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances the Benefits Agency is able to pay residential allowance to clients in a residential programme not registered as a residential home or mental nursing home under the terms of the Registered Homes Act 1984. [8672]

Mr. Roger Evans: Generally, income support residential allowance is payable only to persons in a registered residential care or nursing home. However, residential allowance may be paid to residents of unregistered homes, if the homes are managed or provided by a body incorporated by royal charter or constituted by Act of Parliament—other than a social services authority—and they provide both board and personal care to the customer.

TRANSPORT

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the (a) capital value and (b) expected start date of each of the private finance initiative schemes relating to transport which are summarised in table 5.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1997–98" and which are expected to start in the period 1997–98 to 1999–2000. [8627]

Mr. Watts [holding answer 11 December 1996]: The information is as follows:

	Estimated capital value (£ million)
Birmingham Northern Relief Road	300
CAA New Scottish Air Traffic Control Centre	'200
DBFO road schemes	350
London Transport Communications	150–200

' Subject to review.

Timing is subject to progress with negotiations and with approvals procedures, but most of these schemes are expected to start in 1997–98.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the estimated forward financial commitments for each signed PFI contract agreed by his Department or one of its agencies as summarised in table 5.6 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1997–98". [8620]

Mr. Watts [holding answer 11 December 1996]: Details of individual contracts are commercially sensitive, but we estimate the average annual costs over the next three years to be around £100 million for signed design, build, finance and operate road contracts and a further £100 million for other agreed transport PFI schemes.

Trunk Road Network

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to conduct the next general review of the trunk road network. [9013]

Mr. Watts: We have no plans at present for a further general review of the trunk road network.

French Lorry Drivers Disputes

Sir Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many applications his Department has received (a) nationally and (b) from Devon and Cornwall for compensation from regular exporters of fish and fish products as a consequence of the recent French lorry drivers' dispute; and if he will make a statement. [8692]

Mr. Watts: We have had two inquiries on behalf of fishing interests, neither specific to Devon or Cornwall, about eligibility for claiming compensation and the procedure. I am not aware of any claims having yet been submitted to the French authorities.

Sir Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the criteria governing eligibility for compensation for exporters on a regular basis of United Kingdom products to the European Union following the recent lorry drivers' dispute in France; and if he will make a statement. [8708]

Mr. Watts: Any business which can demonstrate, with hard supporting evidence, that it has suffered financial loss as a direct result of the dispute is at liberty to submit a claim for compensation to the French authorities for their consideration. We shall publish shortly details of the arrangements for making claims.

Road and Vehicle Safety Directorate

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the current objectives of the road and vehicle safety directorate. [8328]

Mr. Bowis: The road and vehicle safety directorate contributes to my right hon. Friend's objectives set out in the "Transport Report 1966" and, in particular, to promoting transport safety by seeking to reduce the number of road accidents in which people are killed and injured and to reducing the adverse impact of transport on the environment through tighter vehicle standards and other measures.

Lorries (Wheel Loss)

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many road fatalities arising from the loss of road wheels from heavy commercial vehicles occurred in each of the last five years; how many wheel loss incidents there were; what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into this matter; what assessment he has made of the advantages of safety wheel nuts in reducing accidents; and if he will make a statement. [8706]

Mr. Bowis: It is estimated that each year there are approximately five to six fatal road accidents involving heavy goods vehicles in which wheel detachment occurs. As data on the causation of accidents are not routinely collected by my Department, figures on the number of fatalities arising from such accidents are not available.

With regard to the number of incidents involving wheel loss each year the cases indicated by the analysis of the Vehicle Inspectorate database represent only those cases where the police have called upon an investigation to be carried out by the inspectorate.

My Department has been represented for many years on the British Standards Committee for wheels and tyres who commissioned research by the Motor Industry Research Association—MIRA—into the problems of wheel loss from commercial vehicles. This research complemented work carried out by the University of Exeter on behalf of the Institute of Road Transport Engineers—IRTE—and the Department of Trade and Industry which contributed some £35,000 to the funding.

Results of the MIRA research showed that the basic cause of the problem of wheel loss is a relaxation of the tension in the wheel fixing and that this took place regardless of whether the vehicle was moving. The British Standard code of practice for the selection and care of tyres and wheels for commercial vehicles advises that wheel fixings should be rechecked for tightness after the vehicle has been standing for 30 minutes or has travelled between 30 or 40 km. Our assessment of the engineering principle of proprietary safety wheel nuts is that they do not address the problem of this initial loss of tension of the wheel fixing and therefore do not reduce the need for regular maintenance.

Motorway Sound Barriers

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 November, Official Report, column 52, on sound barriers on motorways, if he will now make a statement. [9182]

Mr. Watts: I have completed a review of the policy and have no changes to propose. Noise barriers have been provided on new roads and improvement schemes opened after 16 October 1969 where they offer an effective benefit to an appreciable number of properties which would otherwise have qualified for noise insulation under the Noise Insulation Regulations 1975 (Statutory Instrument No 1763), and where the cost of providing the barriers did not exceed the cost of individual insulation. For the purpose of determining whether a property would qualify for noise insulation, changes in noise level are calculated on the basis of projected traffic growth 15 years from the date of opening of the scheme.

It remains the Department's policy, subject to the availability of funds occasionally, and in exceptional circumstances, to exercise a discretionary power of improvement to provide noise barriers alongside trunk roads and motorways which were opened to traffic on or before 16 October 1969, and have not been subject to further improvement.

Subject to the availability of funds, noise barriers may be provided on such unimproved roads open to traffic on, or before, 16 October 1969 where the cost does not exceed the notional cost of insulating properties which would have qualified had the 1975 regulations applied on 16 October 1969. For these purposes qualifying properties are those which existed on 16 October 1969. The calculation of noise impact is to be based upon the assessed traffic flows at 16 October 1984. It must also be technically possible to provide effective barriers alongside the road.

This ensures equitable treatment, with respect to noise barriers, between residents living near to roads opened before and after 16 October 1969.

Seat Belts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate how many (a) drivers, (b) front seat passengers and (c) back seat passengers have been (i) killed and (ii) injured as a result of not wearing a seat belt in a vehicle in Wales in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8233]

Mr. Bowis: Statistics for seat belt wearing are available only until 1993 and only for the occupants of cars and vans. Data on front and back seat passengers are available only for car passengers. The table shows the recorded number of drivers and passengers killed and injured in Wales whilst not wearing a seat belt whether or not one was fitted. The table does not include figures for casualties where the wearing of a belt was not reported—about a quarter of all accidents.

	1991		1992		1993
	Killed	Injured	Killed	Injured	Killed	Injured
Car or van drivers	15	149	11	134	9	146
Car or van passengers	24	800	15	599	10	508
Front seat car passengers	2	61	3	71	4	61
Rear seat car passengers	20	696	11	509	6	420
All van passengers	2	43	1	19	0	27

It is not known how many of these casualties were as a direct result of not wearing a seat belt.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Polystyrene (Fire Risks)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of the Secretary of State for Transport of 29 November, Official Report, column 418, if he will place in the Library copies of the research undertaken by the fire research and development group and the fire research station into the fire and smoke hazards of polystyrene, together with their findings.[7812]

Mr. Sackville: I have arranged for this information to be placed in the Library.

Offenders

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of the (a) male and (b) female population over the age of 30 years has committed at least one (i) minor criminal offence and (ii) serious criminal offence; and if he will make a statement. [7509]

Mr. Maclean: Information available centrally on the percentage of the population with a criminal record relates to convictions for standard list offences only. Standard list offences include all indictable offences, including those triable either way, plus the more serious summary offences. All standard list offences are considered to be serious offences.

Results from criminal histories of a sample of offenders born in 1953 indicate that 31 per cent. of males and 7 per cent. of females born in that year were convicted of at least one standard list offence before the age of 30; and that 34 per cent of males and 8 per cent of females were convicted of at least one standard list offence before the age of 40.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the report, "A Second Exile. The Mental Health Implications of Detention of Asylum Seekers in the United Kingdom", by C. K. Pourgourides, S. P. Sashidharan and P. J. Bracken at the North Birmingham Mental Health trust; and what plans he has to implement its recommendations. [8646]

Mr. Kirkhope: Copies of this report have been forwarded to us. We cannot accept its main recommendation—that the policy of detaining asylum seekers should be abandoned—but we will take account of its detailed recommendations in taking forward detention policy.

Detention under the powers contained in the Immigration Act 1971 is used only as a last resort. Temporary admission is granted wherever possible. The primary consideration is whether a person is likely to comply with any restrictions upon him, including any arrangements for his removal from the country. Detention is unavoidable in a small number of cases if we are to retain an effective immigration control.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

National Lottery

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) how many retailers have been prosecuted for selling (a) lottery tickets and (b) scratch cards to children; and if she will make a statement; [8201]

(2) how many retailers have been prosecuted for selling (a) lottery tickets and (b) scratch cards to children in Northern Ireland; and if she will make a statement; [8199]

(3) how many retailers have been prosecuted for selling (a) lottery tickets and (b) scratch cards to children in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [8202]

Mr. Sproat: These are operational matters for Camelot Group plc. I have, therefore, asked the Director General of the National Lottery, who is responsible for regulating the operation of the lottery, to write to the hon. Member, placing copies of his response in the Library of the House.

British Academy of Sport

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will announce the names of those bids to establish and run the British Academy of Sport that are going forward to the second stage of the evaluation process. [9136]

Mr. Sproat: Thirteen of the 26 bids received to establish and run the British Academy of Sport are going forward to stage 2 of the evaluation process. The 13 bids are:

The Athletes Bid (Hertfordshire)
Bath
Birmingham West Midlands
Central Consortium (Loughborough, Nottingham, Lilleshall)
De Montford University
Houghton Grange (Huntingdon)
Kent Thameside
Manchester
Merseyside
Sheffield
Sports City Foundation (Kettering)
UK Academy 2000 (Yorkshire)
Upper Heyford (Oxfordshire).

We expect to reach a final decision in the early spring of next year.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iraq

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken by the United Nations to implement and monitor the oil for food deal in Iraq under the provisions of UN resolution 986. [8652]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We welcome UN Security Council resolution 986 (1995) which took effect on 10 December. Saddam Hussein's failure to agree to implement this humanitarian gesture for over 18 months has caused the Iraqi people much unnecessary suffering. The UN in New York will monitor contracts for the export of oil from Iraq. It has appointed inspectors to monitor the export of oil from Iraq and the import of humanitarian goods. The UN has also appointed observers to ensure that there is an equitable distribution of humanitarian goods once they are inside Iraq.

European Monitoring Centre for Racism and Xenophobia

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the cost to United Kingdom public funds of the establishment of a European monitoring centre for racism and xenophobia. [8671]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Discussions are continuing about the form which the European monitoring centre for racism and xenophobia should take. It is too early to estimate its likely cost to United Kingdom public funds.

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will veto plans to establish a European monitoring centre for racism and xenophobia. [8670]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: No. Agreement was reached at the Florence European Council on 21 to 22 June 1996, on the principle of a European monitoring centre for racism and xenophobia.

Human Rights

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the British Government are taking to promote the safeguarding of human rights worldwide. [8788]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We participate actively in bodies dealing with human rights, including the United Nations, the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, the Council of Europe and the Commonwealth. We raise human rights concerns with individual Governments bilaterally and with European Union partners.

Nuclear Disarmament

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the British Government are taking in respect of the International Court of Justice ruling of 8 July 1996, relating to nuclear disarmament. [8789]

Mr. David Davis: We do not believe that the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the legality of nuclear weapons gives rise to any new factors affecting the fundamental principles of United Kingdom and NATO defence policy, including the continuing importance of nuclear deterrence in maintaining peace and stability in Europe.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farm Woodland Premium Scheme

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the outcome of the consultation on proposed changes to the farm woodland premium scheme; and what conclusions have been reached on payment rates. [9216]

Mr. Baldry: A wide range of organisations were consulted on the proposed changes to the FWPS announced to Parliament on 24 July, Official Report, column 624. Most organisations welcomed the proposed changes though there were a number of different, often conflicting views. In light of the consultation we will be making some minor modifications to our original proposals and a statutory instrument will be laid before Parliament early next year. Subject to approval by Parliament and the European Commission, it is intended that most of the proposals will be implemented with effect from 1 April 1997. A list of the changes is being placed in the Library of the House.

The rates of payment to apply from 1 April 1996 will be as follows:

	FWPS £/hectare/year	FWS £/hectare/year
Land eligible for Arable Area payments
Outside of the Less Favoured Areas	300	230
Disadvantaged Areas of the Less Favoured Areas (DA)	230	180
Severely Disadvantaged Areas of the Less Favoured Areas (SDA)	160	120
Other Cropped Land and Improved Grassland
Outside of the Less Favoured Areas	260	200
DA	200	160
SDA	140	110
Unimproved Land
Less Favoured Areas	60	30

Where land is to count against the farmer's set-aside obligation, the payment rate will be restricted to the set-aside rate.
The FWS was closed to new applicants in 1992.

Cattle Cull

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current throughput of carcase remains from the over-30-month slaughter programme; and how many weeks it will take to clear the backlog at this rate. [7739]

Mr. Baldry: The slaughter rate of cattle under the over-30-month scheme progressively increased through the autumn to around 60,000 animals per week by the middle of November. This rate would have cleared the backlog declared by farmers as at 2 November under the Government's registration system by Christmas, but animals are not being presented for slaughter at levels consistent with the number registered.

Abattoirs have, therefore, been permitted to take both registered and unregistered OTMS animals provided priority is given to registered animals. In the week ending 8 December just over 40,000 OTMS animals were presented for slaughter against a disposal capacity of around 60,000 animals. Only half of these were registered as part of the backlog which is a good indicator that clearance has almost been achieved.

Certified Herds

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the National Farmers Union to discuss certified herds; and when he expects to bring forward detailed proposals. [8213]

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food meets the NFU regularly. These meetings cover a range of topics including certified herds. Detailed proposals are currently being drawn up. However, the progress of a certified herds scheme is dependant on whether it is decided to proceed with the selective cull.

Seafish Consumption (Seals)

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the annual consumption of seafish by seals in United Kingdom waters, expressed as a proportion of the total catch by British fishing vessels in the same waters over the same period. [8178]

Mr. Baldry: The estimated number of grey seals associated with breeding sites in the United Kingdom waters in 1995 was 115,000. The Ministry does not have comparable figures of common seals, but the present population is estimated to be 28,000. Scientific work indicates that a seal can eat between 1.4 and 1.8 tonnes of fish each year. Current seal numbers may thus have accounted for between 200,000 and 260,000 tonnes of fish. It is not possible to draw a direct comparison with landings from the United Kingdom fleet, since seals mostly eat species which are not consumed by humans.

TREASURY

Bank of England (Archive Material)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to ensure that the Bank of England releases all of its archived papers and documents for the year 1966 before the end of the year. [8353]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Although the Bank of England is not subject to the Public Records Acts, it has as a matter of policy released archived papers after 30 years. Papers relating to 1996 will be made available on 1 January 1997.

Privatised Companies (Individual Shareholders)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage of shares held by individuals in privatised companies (a) on privatisation and (b) as at the most recent date for which figures are available. [8215]

Mr. Jack: The following table gives the information requested in part (a) for major primary sales. The present size of share registers is a matter for the companies themselves and their registrars and may be found in individual companies' annual reports.

Shares sold in the public offer (as a proportion of total shares sold in the offer)

Long-term Care Insurance

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to consult on how to regulate the selling and marketing of long-term care insurance. [9135]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Government's consultation document, "A new partnership for care in old age", published on 7 May, invited comments on a proposed partnership scheme to provide extra protection from the means test for residential care to people who took out a "partnership product" to meet some of the costs of long-term care. Views were also invited on whether the selling and marketing of partnership insurance products, and long-term care insurance more generally should be regulated under the Financial Services Act 1986.

I informed the House on 24 July 1996, Official Report, column 549, that the responses to the consultation suggested a consensus in favour of regulation under the FSA, covering the marketing and selling of all long-term care insurance products, but that before a decision was taken the Treasury would explore further the detailed question of how this should be achieved, and would issue a consultation document seeking the views of interested groups. The Treasury has today published a consultation document which fulfils that undertaking. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

The document explains the Treasury's detailed proposals to regulate the selling and marketing of long-term care insurance under the FSA, and includes a draft statutory instrument which would achieve this. Comments are invited from anyone interested. The end of the consultation period will be announced in the new year when the Government's policy statement on other aspects of its plans to take forward the proposals in "A new partnership for care in old age" is made.

Paymaster Agency

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will report progress with the privatisation of the Paymaster agency. [9183]

Mr. Oppenheim: Initial bids have been received and three bidders have just been short-listed. These are the management and employee buy-out team in partnership with ITNet, Capita Managed Services, and EDS/Hogg Robinson Financial Services Ltd. Final bids are due in by mid-January.

European Union Budget

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Council of Ministers has adopted the letter of amendment No. 2 to the preliminary draft general budget of the European Union for 1997. [9184]

Mr. Oppenheim: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 5 December, Official Report, columns 744–46. The Council adopted the letter of amendment No. 2 to the preliminary draft general budget of the European Union for 1997 at its meeting on 19 November. It has now been passed to the European Parliament as the letter of amendment No. 2 to the draft general budget of the European Union for 1997.

In agreeing this proposal I waived the United Kingdom's scrutiny reserve. I did so because the letter of amendment No. 2 formed an integral part of a package with which the Council aimed to secure the European Parliament's agreement to a budget for 1997 in which total payments would be frozen at 1996 levels in cash terms. Such an outcome would clearly be in the national interest.

Self-assessment

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the number of taxpayers who will face penalties for late return of self-assessment forms; and what is the expected annual yield from such penalties in each of the next three years. [8275]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 9 December 1996]: The Inland Revenue's current working assumption is that 15 per cent. of taxpayers will file their self-assessment tax return later in the first year of the new system, reducing to 10 per cent. in the third year. These figures are based on current taxpayer behaviour, and do not take into account the deterrent effect of late filing penalties or publicity around the filing dates. The automatic penalty for those who do not file by 31 January 1998 will be £100. No estimates have been made of the annual yield from late filing penalties.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria the United Kingdom will propose to govern the choice of the members of the board of the European Central Bank; and if he will take steps to ensure that the Nolan committee's recommendations relating to public appointment will apply to these appointments. [6807]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Article 11 of the Statute of the European System of Central Banks–ESCB—annexed to the EC treaty states that the executive board of the European Central Bank—ECB—shall comprise the president and vice-president of the ECB and four other members. It states that the "President, the Vice-President and the other members of the Executive Board shall be appointed from among persons of recognised standing and professional experience in monetary or banking matters", by common accord of Governments at the level of Heads of State or Government, on a recommendation from the Council after it has consulted the European Parliament and the Governing Council of the ECB. In accordance with article 43.3 of the statute and paragraph 8 of protocol No. 11, member states which do not participate in the single currency are not involved in this procedure and nationals of these countries may not be members of the executive board. Article 50 of the statute provides for some transitional procedural rules to govern the section of the executive board when it is established.

The second paragraph of article 11.1 of the statute states that members of the executive board shall "perform their duties on a full-time basis. No member shall engage in any occupation, whether gainful or not, unless exception is exceptionally granted by the Governing Council".

Article 7 of the statute provides that no member of the executive board, as a decision-making body of the ECB,

"shall seek or take instructions from the Community institutions or bodies, from any government of a Member State or from any other body".

Article 11.4 of the statute states that "If a member of the executive board no longer fulfils the conditions required for the performance of his duties or if he has been guilty of serious misconduct, the [European] Court of Justice may, on application by the Governing Council or the Executive Board, compulsorily retire him".

If the United Kingdom were to participate in the single currency and were therefore involved in the selection of the executive board, the Government would want to be confident that members of the executive board would be able to meet the obligations imposed on them by the treaty, including the statute of the ESCB. The Nolan report relates to public life in the United Kingdom.

ENVIRONMENT

Emission Targets

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action the United Kingdom is taking to ensure that significant emission reduction targets are put forward at the Geneva intersessional conference on climate change in December. [8052]

Mr. Clappison: The United Kingdom proposed, at the first conference of the parties to the climate change convention in Berlin in 1995, that developed countries should agree to reduce their emissions of greenhouse gases to between 5 per cent. and 10 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2010.

We expect this proposal to influence negotiations, including at the convention meeting taking place in Geneva this month, which will lead to an agreement on new commitments at the third conference of the parties in Kyoto, Japan in December 1997.

Building Research Establishment Conservation Support Unit

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those recommendations produced by the consultants for BRECSU which were subsequently not published, indicating the factors underlying their non-publication. [8254]

Mr. Clappison: BRECSU is one of the Department of the Environment's managing contractors for its energy efficiency best practice programme. In this role, it has placed some 600 contracts with a range of organisations. The reports submitted by the contractors are used, together with other consensus knowledge and expertise, to produce a wide range of best practice publications in the buildings and related energy management fields.

Radioactive Waste (Sellafield)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in the attempts by the Environment Agency, as a successor to Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, to secure the release of the safety reports relating to the proposed subterranean repository for radioactive waste near Sellafield; and if he will make a statement on the current working relationship between Nirex and the Environment Agency. [8610]

Mr. Clappison: Following my written answer to the hon. Member on 11 November, Official Report column 3 UK Nirex Ltd. has provided the Library with a list of its research reports. Until Nirex applies to the Environment Agency for authorisation under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993 to dispose of radioactive waste, there is no formal regulatory relationship between the company and the Environment Agency. However, discussions are currently taking place between the two organisations about their future working arrangements.

Rent Rebates

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the additional rent rebate expenditure incurred by local authorities as a result of the application of his guideline rent increases for each year from 1990–91 to 1995–96. [8872]

Mr. Clappison: The guideline rent increases produced gross public expenditure savings which offset the additional cost of rent rebates. The estimated rent rebate expenditure if all authorities had increased their rents in line with the guideline rent increases for each year from 1990–91 to 1995–96 and the estimated gross savings from the extra rent income are:

£ million

	Additional rent rebate expenditure each year	Additional rent income each year
1990–91	255	420
1991–92	224	364
1992–93	295	462
1993–94	268	401
1994–95	266	405
1995–96	272	405

Estate Action

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of continuation funding in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000 for each estate action scheme (i) in London and (ii) nationally. [8849]

Sir Paul Beresford: Within the single regeneration budget planned provision nationally for the remaining estate action commitments is currently as follows:

	£ million
1997–98	170
1998–99	98
1999–2000	61

SRB allocations to each region for 1997–98 for continuing programmes, including estate action, will be determined shortly, following last month's Budget statement. The Government offices in each region then manage their total SRB allocation and have flexibility to vire between programmes where necessary, in order to ensure that all existing estate action commitments continue to be honoured. Regional SRB allocations for subsequent years will be determined by the outcome of future public expenditure surveys.

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of state for the Environment what allowance he made for inflation in determining estate action allocations in (a) 1993 and (b) 1994; and if he will make statement. [8850]

Sir Paul Beresford: Local authorities were advised to make due allowance for inflation before submitting their bids for estate action support to the Department. The amounts available to fund new and continuing estate action schemes in 1993–94 and 1994–95 were determined by the public expenditure survey settlements.

Capital Challenge

Mr. Austin Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide (a) a breakdown for each region of the source of the resources to finance capital challenge and (b) a breakdown of the bids received from each region. [8851]

Sir Paul Beresford: (a) Each Government Department has contributed to capital challenge in proportion to their share of the Government's total provision for local authority capital expenditure. Since total provision is not sub-divided on a regional basis, it is not possible to break down each region's share in the manner requested.

(b) For each service and region, the attached table shows the total value of all bids and the credit approvals sought.

Resource Allocation (London)

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the cost compensation factor used in determining resource allocation for London in (a) the generalised needs index, (b) the single regeneration budget and (c) capital challenge; and what plans he has to amend the allocation. [8852]

Sir Paul Beresford: (a) The generalised needs index, which is used in the distribution of housing annual capital guidelines for local authorities in England, uses regional cost compensation factors to reflect the different costs of capital works in different parts of the country. There were separate factors for the new provision and renovation parts of the index.

Relative cost compensation factors are calculated for each region and the factors are scaled so that the factors for the lowest regions equal 100. The cost compensation factors for London used in the GNI for 1996–97 were 155 (new provision) and 137 (renovation); the figures for other regions range between 100 to 130 and 100 to 114 respectively. The methodology underlying the cost compensation factors, which are updated annually, was reviewed in detail in 1995.

(b) Cost compensation factors are not used in determining the indicative regional allocations for the single regeneration budget challenge fund. Individual bids for resources are based on forecast actual costs, and so should take account of any regional variations in prices.

(c) The apportionment amongst regions of the sums available under the capital challenge pilot scheme is based on each region's share of the national total of local authorities' annual capital guidelines, supplementary credit approvals and capital grants for all services. It takes no account of a cost compensation factor except in so far as it is included in the housing ACG as discussed above.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Cameroon

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received with regard to the environmental impact of World bank-funded transport projects in the Cameroon. [8411]

Dr. Liam Fox: The Friends of the Earth wrote to my right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Chalker on 6 September expressing concern about the possible environmental impact of this programme. The ODA acknowledged the possible risks but pointed out that the World bank was working with the Government of Cameroon to ensure that environmental impact was considered when individual projects were being selected.

Iraq

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what efforts are being made by Her Majesty's Government to enable the Save the Children Fund to enter northern Iraq. [8654]

Dr. Liam Fox: We understand that two members of Save the Children Fund have recently entered northern Iraq.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British aid agencies are operating in (a) northern Iraq and (b) Iraq. [8653]

Dr. Fox: As far as we are aware there are eight British non-governmental organisations operating in northern Iraq and one in Baghdad-controlled Iraq.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which British aid agencies are being denied access to northern Iraq. [8655]

Dr. Fox: The usual route for western NGOs carrying out humanitarian work in northern Iraq since 1991 has been via Turkey. The Turkish Government introduced new requirements in August, since when no British NGOs have been given authority to travel into northern Iraq from Turkey. We have raised this on several occasions with the Turkish Government, urging them to allow reputable British NGOs, who have complied with their new requirements, to enter northern Iraq.

Zambia

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of human rights in Zambia. [8737]

Dr. Fox: Our high commission closely monitors respect of human rights in Zambia. We welcomed the recent legislation establishing a human rights commission but we were concerned that two non-governmental organisations' leaders were questioned by police on 24 November following their reports on the recent elections.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received about the current internal political situation in Zambia. [8736]

Dr. Fox: We receive regular reports from our high commission at Lusaka. There have been no reports of any civil unrest since the presidential and parliamentary elections which were held on 18 November. The current internal political situation is stable.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the budget of the Immigration Appellate Authority in the financial year 1996–97; and what it was in financial years (a) 1995–96 and (b) 1994–95. [7793]

Mr. Streeter: The question concerns a matter which has been assigned to the Court Service under the terms of its framework document. I have therefore asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Doug Henderson, dated 12 December 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about the budget of the Immigration Appellate Authority.

In 1994/95 the Immigration Appellate Authority spent £6,965,344 and in 1995/96 this rose to £8,404,699. The current estimate of the expenditure for the financial year 1996/97 is £9,917,983.

I can confirm that these figures include both tribunal staff and judicial salaries; they do not include any provision for accommodation expenditure.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many (a) full-time and (b) part-time special adjudicators were employed by the Immigration Appellate Authority (i) at the latest available date, (ii) on 1 January 1995 and (iii) on 1 August 1993. [7785]

Mr. Streeter: At the latest available date, 6 December 1996, 29 full-time and 97 part-time immigration adjudicators were designated as special adjudicators by the Lord Chancellor. On 1 January 1995 there were 18 full-time and 44 part-time immigration adjudicators who were so designated. On 1 August 1993 there were 16 full-time and 15 part-time immigration adjudicators so designated.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many appeals against a refusal of asylum are currently outstanding; and what was the number on (a) 1 January 1996, (b) 1 January 1995 and (c) 1 January 1994. [7786]

Mr. Streeter: The question concerns a matter which has been assigned to the Court Service under the terms of its framework document. I have therefore asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Doug Henderson, dated 12 December 1996.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about the number of outstanding asylum appeals.

As at the end of November 1996 there were 20,388 appeals outstanding. This compares with 11,691 at the beginning of 1996, approximately 3,400 in January 1995 and 1,069 in April 1994.

Legal Aid

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the eligibility for legal aid of young people who are suing local education authorities over their school education. [7779]

Mr. Streeter: In addition to qualifying financially, an applicant must also show to the Legal Aid Board that he or she has reasonable grounds for taking, defending or being a party to proceedings, and that it is reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case for legal aid to be granted. However, I should make clear that, as yet, the Legal Aid Board has not yet received any applications for legal aid in the case relating to educational achievement, which was recently reported in the press.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent representations he has received from the Bar Council on the subject of reform of the legal aid budget; and if he will make a statement. [7915]

Mr. Streeter: I recently met the chairman of the Bar Council to discuss the reforms. I look forward to having further discussion and consultations with the Bar and other interested bodies as the reforms progress.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many certificates issued by the Legal Aid Board were revoked in (i) 1992, (ii) 1993, (iii) 1994 and (iv) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [7907]

Mr. Streeter: The number of civil legal aid certificates revoked in each year was as follows:

1992–93: 11,630

1993–94: 19,503

1994–95: 21,773

1995–96: 25,032.

The figure for 1992–93 represents revoked emergency certificates only because revoked substantive certificates were not recorded on the Legal Aid Board's case administration computer system until 1993–94. The 1993–94 figure does not include substantive revoked certificates for Cardiff as that office was not upgraded with the new computer system until August 1994.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in how many cases in the past six months claims for legal aid to pursue civil claims for compensation in cases involving (a) criminal harassment by landlords, (b) illegal eviction and (c) disrepair have been refused; and how many of these claims have been granted on appeal. [7800]

Mr. Streeter: The information requested is not available as the data gathered by the Legal Aid Board do not separately identify those categories of cases.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he last met the Law Society to discuss the provision and funding of legal aid; and if he will make a statement. [7916]

Mr. Streeter: The Lord Chancellor, I and officials in my Department regularly meet representatives of the Law Society to discuss a very wide range of issues relating to the provision and funding of legal aid.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the 20 (a) solicitors firms and (b) barristers who have received the largest sums of money from the legal aid scheme for each year for which information is available. [8700]

Mr. Streeter: In the time available it has not been possible to provide the information requested. I will reply as soon as possible.

Molestation

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the advantages of statutory tort of molestation following the Court of Appeal judgment in the Burris v. Azadani case in July 1995. [7795]

Mr. Streeter: The consultation paper, "Stalking—the Solutions", which was published by the Home Office and the Lord Chancellor's Department in July 1996, discussed the question whether there should be a statutory tort of molestation or whether cases of molestation should be dealt with under the common law, in the light of recent cases. Its conclusion, that there should be a statutory tort, was supported on consultation and the Protection from Harassment Bill, which was introduced on 5 December, accordingly contains a statutory tort.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 12 December. [7453]

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

War Pensions

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister if he will now publish in the Official Report the ministerial correspondence and discussion papers that led to the change in rules for the award of war pensions for deafness and pension increases for further deterioration. [8728]

The Prime Minister: The texts of the address and the background note given to members of the Central Advisory Committee on War Pensions about the change in medical opinion regarding the interaction between service-related noise-induced sensorineural hearing loss and subsequent hearing loss have been placed in the Library. Inter-ministerial correspondence and discussion papers leading up to a change are not normally published.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Modern Apprenticeships

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list (a) the planned timetable, (b) the planned number participating and (c) the estimated public expenditure for the introduction of modern apprenticeships in each Government Department. [8840]

Mr. Freeman: The use of modern apprenticeships is a decision taken by individual Government Departments. Information on take-up in the civil service is not held centrally. Departments are actively encouraged to consider modern apprenticeships as part of their human resource strategies to develop future managers and encourage lifetime learning.

Fire Safety

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what cost compliance assessment has been undertaken of the proposed Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations by the deregulation unit. [8345]

Mr. Freeman: The Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Earlier proposals for implementing the directives had significant costs associated with them which had led us to adopt a new approach, recognising the high standards of fire safety that already exist in workplaces. The Home Secretary undertook a further public consultation during the summer on a revised draft of these regulations, which, amongst other issues, specifically sought advice from business on compliance costs. The Home Office is currently preparing a compliance cost assessment which will accompany the proposed regulations.

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment the deregulation task force has made of the introduction of the proposed Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations; and what meetings he has had with business representatives to discuss their possible compliance costs. [8344]

Mr. Freeman: The Workplace (Fire Precautions) Regulations are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. The deregulation task force commented on the Government's proposed approach in its 1995–96 report. The Home Secretary undertook a public consultation during the summer on a draft of these regulations, and members of the task force have since provided views on the draft regulations. My noble Friend Baroness Blatch, Minister of State at the Home Office, and I are also discussing compliance costs for these regulations with the British Retail Consortium with whom yesterday we visited some premises.

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment he has made of the efficiency scrutiny report on the implementation and enforcement of EC law in the United Kingdom in respect of its fire safety provisions. [8343]

Mr. Freeman: The recommendations on fire safety issues were largely taken forward in the later fire safety scrutiny, the Government's response to which was announced on 21 May 1996, Official Report, column 100. The Government have also acted upon the two recommendations relating to examination by fire service inspectors of complaints about enforcement action and encourage of fire authority participation in local business partnerships.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 14 November, Official Report, column 342, if she will list individually those national vocational qualifications accredited at 30 June that (a) had not attracted full awards and (b) had attracted fewer than 100 awards. [6971]

Mr. Paice: The information requested is contained in a number of tables, copies of which have been placed in the Library. As I said in my answer of 14 November, individual vocational qualifications are subject to accreditation at regular intervals and, given the time it takes after accreditation for awards to become available to centres, and individuals to train towards them, at any one time a considerable proportion of individual NVQs will have attracted few awards. Only about a quarter of the titles listed had an award accredited before 1994.

European Social Fund Bid

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will submit a programme under objective 4 of the European social fund for 1997 to 1999. [8552]

Mr. Paice: Yes.

Education Spending

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the proportion of gross domestic product spent on education in each Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development country in the last 10 years. [8557]

Mr. Paice: The information requested for those OECD countries for which data are available is shown in the table. The figures given are based on information provided by each country to OECD for its latest edition of "Education at a Glance", published on 9 December. Copies of "Education at a Glance" will shortly be available in the Library.

Employment Schemes

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people after attending (1) employment rehabilitation service, (2) Employment Service services, (3) employment training, (4) the employment transfer scheme, (5) the free forward fares scheme, (6) industrial training boards, (7) job clubs, (8) the job creation programme, (9) the jobfinder's grant, (10) the job interview guarantee, (11) the jobmatch scheme, (12) the jobplan workshop, (13) the job review, (14) the job release scheme, (15) job review workshops, (16) the job start scheme, (17) the jobseeker's allowance, (18) the job share programme, (19) the job splitting scheme, (20) the job training programme, (21) learning for work, (22) job seminars, (23) local enterprise agencies, (24) Manpower Services Commission, (25) non-advanced and work-related further education, (26) new job training scheme, (27) the national policy skills scheme and (28) national record of achievement (a) went into employment and (b) went on to further schemes, including those who left before completion of the scheme, in each year of each scheme's operation; and what type and level of qualification each leaver obtained for each year to the latest available year for which data are available. [8738]

Mr. Paice: The information requested can be provided only at a disproportionate costs.

Liverpool Blue Coat School

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she expects to announce confirmation of the schedule 5 enactment in respect of the grant-maintained status of the Liverpool Blue Coat school; and if she will make a statement. [8871]

Mr. Robin Squire: Liverpool local education authority has requested that the Secretary of State declares void the ballot for grant-maintained status in respect of the Blue Coat school. No decision on grant-maintained status can be made until the investigation into the ballot complaint has been completed. That investigation will be completed shortly.

Project Work

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress she has made on extending the project work pilots; and if she will make a statement. [9272]

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In November I announced my plans to extend the project work approach to 28 new pilot areas across the country, covering up to 100,000 people, and to test a number of variations on the basic model. A list of the locations and start dates of the new pilots is contained in the following table.

We will be piloting variations to the approach used in Hull and Medway and Maidstone to see whether we can improve its effectiveness. There will be an emphasis on literacy and numeracy in all the new pilots. Up to 10,000 people will have access to intensive help with literacy and numeracy. A further 9,000 people will be covered by pilots where we will be seeking increased involvement of the private sector. In pilots covering around 14,000 people, workstart will be replaced by jobmatch as an additional programme available to people in the pilot. Jobmatch offers grants to people who take part-time jobs as a stepping stone into full-time work. The results from the jobmatch pilots currently running have been encouraging, and we want to see whether jobmatch is a more cost-effective addition to the help available to project work participants than workstart. We will also test the added value of workstart by removing it altogether in some pilots. In other pilots we will be varying the length of the initial period of jobsearch help for around 13,000 people.

Through these pilots, we will provide a package of specialist help and advice for people who have been out of work for a long time and face significant disadvantages. I believe that these pilots are an innovative and useful addition to the help that we already provide for unemployed people.

Type of pilot	Starting date	locations piloting this type
Basic model	February 1997	Dudley and Sandwell Nottingham Bristol Bath Weston-super-Mare North East London Derby Hull Medway and Maidstone
Intensive literacy and numeracy help	April 1997	Bradford Huddersfield Norwich Dundee Stoke
Increased private sector involvement	April 1997	Hertford and Harlow Peterborough Edinburgh Portsmouth
Differences in length and content of the intensive help prior to mandatory work experience	February 1997 (full range of ES help excluding Workstart)	Bolton and Bury Swansea Neath and Port Talbot Merthyr and Rhymney Preston Lanarkshire
Variation including Jobmatch	February 1997 (full range of ES help including Jobmatch)	East London Wigan and St. Helens
Variation with period A shortened to 8 weeks	April 1997 (8 week period of intensive help)	Brighton South Tyneside
Variation with period A shortened to 4 weeks	April 1997 (4 week period of intensive help)	Leicester Grimsby Dunfermline

Contract for Work

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress she has made on the contract for work pilot; and if she will make a statement. [9271]

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In November I announced that the Department would be introducing pilots to explore ways in which the talent for innovation of the private sector might be used to help unemployed people back to work. The Chancellor announced in his Budget speech that these pilots would be called contract for work.

The aim of the pilots will be to test the cost effectiveness of the private sector in getting long-term unemployed people back to work and to test specific approaches to that task. The pilots will have an incentive-based funding structure which rewards success.

There will be two private sector contract for work pilots, each covering around 3,000 people. Another 6,000 people will be placed on programmes run by the Employment Service, to provide an additional measure against which the performance of the private sector can be judged. The pilots will last for 12 months and participants will be referred to them for a maximum of six months. The pilots will start in the spring and invitations to tender should be issued by mid-February.

On locations for the pilots, I have decided that the private sector interest should be explored across four major cities, including Manchester, London, Glasgow and Birmingham. A final decision will be made according to the quality of bids received. Before invitations to tender are issued, my officials will initiate a series of discussions with a range of organisations to draw on their expertise and experience in considering detailed design issues.

Through these pilots we will provide an opportunity for the long-term unemployed to work directly with the private sector, an approach which I hope will be mutually beneficial. I believe that these pilots will be a welcome and necessary addition to the help that already exists for unemployed people.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of the Government funding for the training and enterprise councils was represented by the salaries of their chief executives in the last year for which figures are available. [8424]

Mr. Paice: The information requested is not available. However, in line with other private companies, training and enterprise councils are required to provide information about their funding and about the remuneration of directors in their annual accounts. Copies of individual TEC accounts and of an amalgamated income and expenditure account for TECs in England are held in the Library.

HEALTH

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the onset times of the cases of the new variant of CJD by month; and if he will make a statement. [7948]

Mr. Horam: The month and year of onset for the 14 cases of new variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease confirmed by the national CJD surveillance unit up to the end of November 1996, listed in order of onset, are:

1. January 1994
2. February 1994
3. March 1994
4. June 1994
5. July 1994
6. August 1994
7. December 1994
8. January 1995
9. January 1995
10. January 1995
11. March 1995
12. July 1995
13. August 1995
14. January 1996

Cases can be confirmed only by examination of brain pathology. Normally this is done post mortem, and in the rare cases where a positive brain biopsy is obtained this is not possible until fairly late in the course of the disease. Therefore there is a long delay between the date of onset—the date of the first clinical symptoms related to CJD—and the date of confirmation. The median duration of illness in these cases is 14 months.

In-patient Treatment

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued on the necessary period of in-patient treatment for a proper risk assessment to be carried out before a patient's discharge. [8262]

Mr. Burns: Guidance issued by the national health service executive in 1994 on the discharge of mentally disordered people requires a full risk assessment to be carried out before discharge of any patient who may present special risks. There is no set time limit for this task.

Mental Health Services

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the assessments by NHS executive regional offices of individual area health authorities' performance in the provision of child and adolescent mental health services; and if he will make a statement. [8521]

Mr. Burns: At this stage there are no plans to publish information relating to the performance by health authorities on child and adolescent mental health services.

Child Prostitution

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to encourage health authorities to address the health risks arising from child prostitution. [8429]

Mr. Burns: Local authority social services have a duty to make inquiries where they have reasonable cause to suspect that a child in their area is suffering, or is likely to suffer, significant harm, and this would include information suggesting that a child may need protection from child prostitution. Following the introduction of mandatory children's services plans, the Department of Health is taking forward work to strengthen co-operation between social services and health and education and to encourage user participation in the planning process.

"The Patient's Charter: Services for Children and Young People" details children's rights and expectations of the standards of service the national health service is aiming to achieve. Multidisciplinary teams in young offenders institutions provide a range of preventive health services relating to sexual health, HIV, hepatitis and safe sex. These teams, together where necessary with NHS specialists and outside agencies, also provide a range of counselling relevant to those most vulnerable to commercial sexual exploitation on release.

Sheffield Health Authority (Funding)

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the total funding available for Sheffield health authority and (b) the increase in funding that has been allocated to Sheffield health authority for 1997–98; if he will express this in percentage terms above inflation; if this funding can be used for the city's hospital trusts; and if he will make a statement. [8298]

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent, by NHS regional office, on consultancy fees relating to the private finance initiative. [8506]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 26 November, at column 119.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many consultants there were in (a) general medicine, (b) general surgery, (c) orthopaedics and (d) obstetrics and gynaecology in the last year. [8479]

Mr. Malone: The number of hospital consultants in general medicine, general surgery, traumatic and orthopaedic surgery and obstetrics and gynaecology last year is as follows:

Hospital medical consultants in selected specialties in England at 30 September 1995 (whole-time equivalent)

	Number
Obstetrics and gynaecology	880
General surgical group	3,540
of which
General surgery	1,030
Traumatic and orthopaedic surgery	910
General medicine group	3,720
of which
General medicine	240

Acute and Community Hospitals

Ms Jowell: To ask the secretary of State for Health (1) how many acute hospitals there are in each district health authority area; [8495]

(2) how many community hospitals there are in each district health authority area. [8496]

Mr. Horam: Information is not available centrally in the form requested. The "Health and Social Services Yearbook", copies of which are available in the Library, details the addresses of all hospitals in each NHS trust and sets out the main trusts in contract with each health authority.

Accident and Emergency Units

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many accident and emergency units there are in England. [8498]

Mr. Horam: There are 211 national health service trusts with large accident and emergency departments on 1995–96 figures.

This is different from the figures given in "Bed availability for England 1995–96" due to inconsistencies in data collection following the abolition of the regional health authorities earlier this year. This is being corrected.

Creche Facilities

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital trusts have crèche facilities for (a) staff, (b) relatives, (c) visitors and (d) patients. [8502]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not available centrally.

Porters

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many porters were employed by acute hospital trusts in each of the last five years. [8476]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not available centrally.

Patient Trolleys

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patient trolleys were owned by the NHS in each district health authority area in each of the last five years. [8477]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not held centrally.

NHS Hospitality

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total amount spent on hospitality in the NHS in the last three years. [8507]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not held centrally.

Care Programme

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many social services departments had implemented the Government's care programme approach on 1 April. [8508]

Mr. Burns: There is no requirement for social services departments to implement the care programme approach as it is the responsibility of national health service trusts.

NHS Staff Conference Fees

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State of Health how much was spent on NHS staff conference registration fees in each of the last three years. [8482]

Mr. Horam: No central data are available which identify spending on national health service staff conference registration fees.

Air Travel Costs

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent by the NHS on air travel to international conferences, seminars and business meetings in each of the last five years. [8486]

Mr. Malone: The information requested is not held centrally.

Life-support Machines

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many life-support machines there were in each hospital trust in each of the last five years. [8488]

Mr. Horam: An extremely wide range of equipment is used throughout national health service hospitals for the purpose of life support. The information requested is not, therefore, available centrally.

Annual Reports (NHS Trusts)

Mr. Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent by each NHS trust on the preparation and production of their annual report in each of the last four years. [8490]

Mr. Horam: Information on spending on the preparation and production of annual reports by national health service trusts is not available centrally.

Hospital Beds

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals beds are currently available per 24-hour period by district health authority area. [8492]

Mr. Horam: Information is not collected in the form requested. Information on the average daily number of available beds for each NHS trust is published annually in "Bed Availability for England" copies of which are available in the Library.

Hospital Closures

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) acute hospitals, (b) community hospitals and (c) accident and emergency units have closed in each of the last five years; and how many are planned to close in the coming financial year. [8494]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not available centrally. A list of those substantial changes in service provision which have been contested by community health councils is available in the Library.

Working Children

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his proposals to ensure that local authority byelaws are updated to protect working children against health and safety hazards in industrial and commercial premises. [8873]

Mr. Burns: Children are not permitted to be employed in industrial undertakings. Health and safety legislation, which is not contained in local authority byelaws, applies to all workers regardless of their age.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the maximum number of hours a child (a) under the age of 15 years and (b) aged 15 years will be legally permitted to work during school term time, following the implementation of the recommendation arising from his Department's recent consultation exercise. [8874]

Mr. Burns: The maximum permitted number of working hours for children will remain exactly as they are at present, that is 17 hours a week for those under the age of 15, and 20 hours a week for those aged 15 or over.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department last carried out a study to examine the effectiveness of local authority byelaws governing the employment of children, with particular reference to their implementation and enforcement; and if he will conduct a further study. [8794]

Mr. Burns: The last study in this area was reported in 1972. I have no plans at present to commission a further study.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's policy in respect of implementing proposals to protect the health, safety and education of working children. [8796]

Mr. Burns: Officials have recently issued a paper outlining our plans to implement our proposals. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will liaise with the Department of the Environment to ensure that local authorities have adequate resources to enforce byelaws governing the employment of children. [8795]

Mr. Burns: It is for local authorities to determine their expenditure priorities.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many respondents to his Department's recent consultation exercise on the employment of children favoured (a) parliamentary legislation and (b) revision of local authority byelaws. [8797]

Mr. Burns: We did not seek views on the type of legislation to be used. Of the views expressed, the majority were in favour of the revision of byelaws.

Food Poisoning

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many outbreaks of E. coli 0157 food poisoning have occurred in the Carlisle city council area in the last five years; and how many people were affected in each of the outbreaks; [7923]

(2) how many cases of E. coli 0157 food poisoning have occurred; and how many people have died from the infection in the Carlisle city council area in the last five years. [7924]

Mr. Horam [holding answer 9 December 1996]: For information on the number of cases of E. coli 0157 in the United Kingdom, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) on 2 December at column 551.

There were no outbreaks of E. coli 0157 in the city of Carlisle between 1991 to date. Information about single E. coli 0157 cases in the city of Carlisle is given in the table:

E. coli 0157 cases from the city of Carlisle

Year	Cases	Deaths[1]
1991[2]	0	0
1995	10	0

Source:
Public Health Laboratory Service Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre.
Notes:
[1] Confirmed with Office for National Statistics.
[2] PHLS (Carlisle) did not routinely test specimens for E. coli 0157 until October 1991.

The higher number of E. coli 0157 cases in 1995 were investigated by North Cumbria health authority and found to be associated with the consumption of wild field mushrooms, picked from fields where cattle had been grazing. The cases were dispersed over a wide area and no link was established with any particular field.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Nuclear Accidents

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what insurance arrangements cover the clean-up, restoration and personal compensation payments that may arise from an accident at, or involving (a) a commercially operated nuclear power plant, (b) a nuclear fuel cycle manufacturing or processing installation and (c) nuclear materials in transit resulting in the release of radiation; and how the levels of liability have been calculated. [5729]

Mr. Page: Under United Kingdom law, where third party damage or injury is caused as a result of a nuclear incident at a nuclear site or involving nuclear materials in transit, the UK operator is liable to pay compensation up to a liability limit of £140 million. The limit, which is kept under review, is in line with the recommendation of the nuclear energy agency of the OECD and takes account of the level of commercial insurance cover available.

As a result of the UK's membership of the Paris and Brussels conventions, further public funds and international funds are available, up to a maximum of 300 special drawing rights of the International Monetary Fund—approximately £280 million. If claims exceed this latter figure, additional compensation may be provided by Parliament to the extent that it shall determine.

In line with the Paris convention, compensation is available for damage to persons and property. This would include the costs of environmental restoration and clean up, where there is damage to property, in accordance with normal UK civil law principles as to the assessment of damage.

Arms Sales

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received (a) by letter and (b) otherwise from opponents of arms sales, since 2 December. [8251]

Mr. Nelson: I regularly receive representations from opponents of arms sales. Those concerning aspects of policy for which my Department is not responsible are directed to the appropriate Department.

World Trade Organisation Meeting (Singapore)

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how he will report back from the World Trade Organisation review in Singapore in December. [7895]

Mr. Nelson: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will report to the House in due course on the outcome of the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting, which is taking place in Singapore from 9 to 13 December.

Defence Companies (Corporate Governance)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received on the export provisions of the corporate governance material issued by British defence companies. [8612]

Mr. Nelson: No such representations have been received.

Digital Broadcasting

Mr. Renton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress he has made in finalising regulations to require BSkyB to license its decoder box and other associated digital technology to other broadcasters. [8319]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 11 December 1996]: The final consultation on the regulations which will apply when conditional access services for digital television start, late next year, was completed on 11 December. The draft regulations ensure that whoever establishes a population of set-top boxes, all broadcasters will be able to gain access on fair, reasonable and non-discriminatory terms. We will now make the final regulations available to Parliament for consideration before the recess. Subject to parliamentary approval, they will come into force within 21 calendar days.

Regulations covering the licensing of industrial property for conditional access technology came into force on 23 August this year. These oblige companies who license one manufacturer to build set-up boxes to consider applications from other manufacturers for similar licensing of the same industrial property. Any decision not to permit such licensing would have to be based on fair and transparent grounds, and could be challenged directly in the courts. To go beyond this, to require compulsory licensing of intellectual property rights, would be an extreme step, which the United Kingdom would contemplate only if no other action to tackle anti-competitive behaviour was available. Given that the digital television market is still at a very early stage, with no services being offered before next year, it would be premature to reach such a conclusion.

SCOTLAND

Gourock Ropeworks

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last discussed the matters relating to the demolition of the Gourock ropeworks, Port Glasgow with representatives of (a) Historic Scotland and (b) Inverclyde council; and if he will make a statement. [7929]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Historic Scotland is an executive agency within the Scottish Office and reports to my right hon. Friend on built heritage matters. My right hon. Friend has not been in direct discussion with Inverclyde council about the Gourock ropeworks.

An application for listed building consent to demolish the ropeworks was passed by Inverclyde district council to Historic Scotland in March of this year. Following careful consideration, my right hon. Friend decided not to call in the application for his own determination. Inverclyde council was informed on 30 August that it was thus free to determine the application itself. I understand that listed building consent for demolition, subject to conditions, has now been issued by the council.

Mental Illness Specific Grant

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 26 November, Official Report, column 162, who is carrying out the evaluation of the effectiveness of the mental illness specific grant and the advisability of alternative funding arrangements; when he expects to receive the report of this assessment; and if he will make a statement. [7941]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Nuffield centre for community care studies at Glasgow university was commissioned to undertake an evaluation of the grant. The draft final report has been sent to the Scottish Office. It is expected that the final report will be submitted early in 1997. Future arrangements will be considered in light of the findings of that study, the social work services inspectorate report on day services for people with mental illness, the views of the Scottish Affairs Committee on the closure of psychiatric hospitals in Scotland and analysis of monitoring returns from all projects.

Seat Belts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many drivers have been prosecuted for allowing a child under 14 years to travel in a vehicle without wearing a seat belt or legal restraint in Scotland in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [8230]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him yesterday regarding the prosecution of seat belt offences.

WALES

NHS Administration

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the NHS budget was spent on administration in (a) 1988 and (b) at the latest date for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [8108]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The proportion of the NHS budget in Wales spent on administration in 1988–89 and 1995–96 was about 6 per cent. and 7 per cent. respectively.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total grant made by the Welsh Office to the Welsh Development Agency; and how much of this grant was spent in advertising in England to encourage companies to relocate in Wales, in the last year for which information is available. [8106]

Mr. Hague: Total central Government provision to the Welsh Development Agency in 1995–96 was £29.515 million.

The guidelines covering the agency's inward investment function and marketing activity specifically state that it should not actively encourage relocations to Wales from any part of the United Kingdom. Where, however, companies approach the agency for help with relocation projects, the agency should seek to establish that such projects have the potential to provide net additional benefits for the United Kingdom economy and not just for Wales.

Expenditure on advertising is an operational matter for the agency under its acting chief executive. I have therefore asked the acting chief executive to write to the hon. Member with details of the agency's advertising expenditure in 1995–96. I shall arrange for a copy of the reply to be placed in the Library of the House.

Health Service Staff

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) general practitioners, (b) nurses and (c) auxiliary staff there are currently in Wales. [8173]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The latest available information is as follows:

At 29 March 1996 there were 1,850 general practitioners in Wales, of which 1,726 were unrestricted principals.

At 30 June 1996 there were 24,848 whole-time equivalent nursing and midwifery staff directly employed by health authorities and NHS trusts in Wales. In addition there were 622 whole-time equivalent nurses employed by general medical practitioners at 1 October 1995.

At 30 June 1996 there were 5,832 whole-time equivalent ancillary staff directly employed by health authorities and NHS trusts in Wales.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the overall number of (a) administrative staff, (b) managerial staff, (c) nurses, (d) junior doctors and (e) other medical staff employed in each region in Wales for each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement. [7486]

Mr. Hague: As the information is not available on a consistent geographical basis for the years requested, figures are provided for each organisation in Wales. For convenience these organisations have been grouped into three broad areas as shown in the following table. Information for nurses is not available separately from midwifery staff.

[1] At 30 September for 1993 to 1995 and 30 June 1996.
[2] Organisations are listed under the name they had at 30 June 1996. Organisational changes mean that figures for some individual organisations are not comparable over all the years given.
[3] Including managers (staff paid on manager payscales).
[4] Excludes pre-registration learners.
[5] Senior registrars, registrars, senior house officers and house officers working in the community or public health service.
[6] Consultants, staff grades, associate specialists, hospital practitioners and clinical assistants working in the community or public health service but excluding general medical practitioners.
[7] Includes staff formerly employed in the Powys ambulance service.
[8] Data for 1996 include staff employed by Breast Test Wales which was previously included with Welsh Health Common Services staff.
[9] Includes staff formerly employed in the East Dyfed ambulance service.
[10] Staff employed in Welsh Health Common Services Authority and Health Promotion Wales.

Modern Apprenticeships

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many young people have started accelerated modern apprenticeships in Wales, by local authority. [8525]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the number of young people who have started on accelerated modern apprenticeships in each of the training and enterprise council areas of Wales are detailed in the following table:

Cumulative starts on accelerated modern apprenticeships by TEC area as at 10 November 1996

Name of training and enterprise council	Starts on accelerated modern apprenticeships
Gwent	192
Mid Glamorgan	135
North-east Wales	308
North-west Wales	94
Powys	37
South Glamorgan	161
West Wales	337
Wales total	1,264

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was his Department's initial forecast of the number of places available on accelerated modern apprenticeships in Wales. [8526]

Mr. Evans: The departmental report published in March 1995 estimated that 1,000 young people would enter accelerated modern apprenticeships in 1995–96, the first year of the programme. In the event, 850 places were contracted with the Welsh TECs for that year and 843 young people commenced training. Planning assumptions for 1996–7 and 1997–8 are for around 1,100 new starts in each year, but as indicated in the departmental report, published in March 1996, in practice the balance between accelerated modern apprenticeships and modern apprenticeships will vary according to local demands.

Cwmcarn Grant-maintained School

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many objections he received to proposals to establish a sixth form at Cwmcarn grant-maintained school; how many of those objectives were from (a) individuals and (b) organisations; and if he will list those organisations; [8347]

(2) how many pupils are required at a school for it to be granted sixth form status; and what guidance on this his Department has issued; [8529]

(3) what consultations he undertook before granting Cwmcarn grant-maintained school sixth form status. [8354]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Eight objections were received to the published proposal of 15 January 1996, all of which were from organisations. They were:

The former Gwent local education authority

Risca comprehensive school

Blackwood comprehensive school

Pontllanfraith comprehensive school

Oakdale comprehensive school

Newbridge comprehensive school

Gwent tertiary college

Further Education Funding Council for Wales.

Each proposal is considered on its merits and in the light of guidance in Welsh Office circular 13/95, "The Supply of School Places", a copy of which is in the Library. No particular number of pupils is required for sixth form status. My. right hon. Friend is not required to undertake consultations on statutory proposals.

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to publish the audited accounts of Cwmcarn grant-maintained school. [8348]

Mr. Evans: My right hon. Friend does not publish the audited accounts of grant-maintained schools. It is for the schools' governing bodies to ensure that the accounts are available at the school for inspection by any member of the public.

Meningitis

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of meningitis among Cardiff students have been reported since 28 September; and if he will list the location at which each sufferer was first diagnosed, indicating the date. [8727]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There have been seven cases of meningococcal infection, including both meningitis and septicaemia forms of the disease, reported amongst Cardiff students since 28 September 1996. Details are given in the following table.

Cases of meningococcal infection among Cardiff students

Case number	Hospital	Date admitted	Date diagnosed[1]
1	Royal Gwent, Newport	16 October 1996	16 October 1996
2	University Hospital of Wales	16 November 1996	16 November 1996
3	University Hospital of Wales	26 November 1996	28 December 1996
4	University Hospital of Wales	28 November 1996	28 December 1996
5	University Hospital of Wales	27 November 1996	29 November 1996
6	University Hospital of Wales	29 November 1996	29 November 1996
7	University Hospital of Wales	2 December 1996	[2]5 December 1996

[1] Refers to the date of clinical diagnosis as cases may not be microbiologically confirmed until several days later.
[2] Admitted for observation and commenced on treatment as a precautionary measure from 2 December 1996.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of meningitis that have occurred in Wales since 20 September his Department assessed to have been (a) part of a cluster and (b) isolated instances. [8798]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There have been 44 notified cases of meningococcal infection, including both meningitis and septicaemia, reported to the communicable disease surveillance centre, Wales since 20 September 1996. There has been one reported cluster. This centred around the university halls, Penylan, Cardiff. A cluster is usually understood as more than one case reported, in a single setting, in a short period of time.

Sea Empress

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent research his Department has evaluated into the effects in the (a) short, (b) medium and (c) long-term on the health and welfare of flora and fauna arising from the accident involving the discharge of oil from the Sea Empress tanker in February. [8800]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My right hon. Friend has established the Sea Empress environmental evaluation committee to assess the environmental consequences of the oil spill. A research programme is being taken forward and a final report is expected in 1997.

Village Hall Repairs

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes he has made to existing grant schemes to enable local groups to obtain funding for substantial repairs to village halls. [9282]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: In order to fulfil the commitment given in the White Paper, "A Working Countryside for Wales", I have reconsidered the future of the £472,000 budget for the voluntary youth services, village halls and community centres scheme and have decided to pass the management of it to the Wales Council for Voluntary Action—WCVA. Most of the money will be used towards the match funding of a £5.6 million grant the WCVA has secured from the Millennium Commission for its project, 21st century halls for Wales. The project will fund improvements to or the rebuilding of around 50 community halls which will then stand as beacons of good practice. A small proportion will be reserved to provide an advice service for all village and community hall committees.

DEFENCE

Hawk Aircraft

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's role in the licensing for export by United Kingdom manufacturers of Hawk (a) attack and (b) trainer aircraft; and what different provisions apply to the two types of Hawk. [8613]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department advises the Department of Trade and Industry on various aspects of export licensing. These include the legitimate defence requirements of the recipient, the effect on regional stability and the risk of use against United Kingdom forces. These provisions apply to all export licence applications referred to the MOD.

Low Flying

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what aircraft types are permitted to carry out air-to-air refuelling at the lowest notified altitudes in areas 10 and 12. [8602]

Mr. Soames: RAF tankers Tristar, VC10K and VC10 C Mk1K and receiver aircraft VC10, Hercules, Tornado, Harrier, Sea Harrier, Jaguar, Nimrod and Sentry are permitted to carry out air-to-air refuelling exercises at the lowest notified altitudes in areas 10 and 12.

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the locations of breaches of low flying regulations in each year since 1992; and in each case what disciplinary action was taken against the aircrew responsible. [8522]

Mr. Soames: Details of breaches in 1992 are not recorded centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Details of breaches and disciplinary action taken for 1993 are given in the seventh report of the Defence Committee, HC 314, "Low Flying; Follow-up to the Fifth Report of Session 1989–90", Session 1993–94, on low flying, pages 35 to 36, and in the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 5 December 1994, Official Report, column 112. I refer the hon. Member to the answers that I gave to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) on 22 November 1995, Official Report, column 1042 and to the hon. Member for Meirionydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) on 18 April 1996, Official Report, column 578, for 1994 and 1995. The following additional breaches of low flying regulations in 1995 have been confirmed by RAF police investigations since the latter date and, unless stated otherwise, a lateral breach of the avoidance area listed occurred in each case.

Date	Location	Numbers and types of A/C	Nationality	Nature of breach
22 May	Billinge, Lancs.	1 × Tornado	TTTE	Unauthorised flight within LFA8 of the UKLFS
21 September	Full Sutton E. York.	3 × Hercules	Belgian Air Force	Full Sutton Airfield avoidance area
21 September	Full Sutton	3 × Hercules	Belgian Air Force	Unauthorised flight within LFA11 of the UKLFS
21 November	Bicester, Oxon	1 × F15	USAF	Overflew Bicester, a town listed for avoidance
20 December	Caerlaverock, Dumfries and Galloway	1 × Tornado	RAF	Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust avoidance area

In the case where the nationality is shown as TTTE, the aircraft came from the tri-national Tornado training establishment at RAF Cottesmore which trains aircrew of the Royal Air Force, German air force and Italian air force using aircraft provided by all three nations.

Formal disciplinary action under the service discipline Acts has been taken in one of the cases listed above. The pilot of the Tornado responsible for the breach at Billinge, Lancashire on 22 May was dealt with under summary procedures and pleaded guilty to one charge, contrary to section 69 of the Air Force Act 1955, of conduct to the prejudice of good order and Air Force discipline for which he was reprimanded and fined.

In cases involving UK aircrew where formal disciplinary action is not appropriate, individuals may be interviewed by their station commander or other appropriate senior officer. Such action could be recorded on individual's career records and affect flying status and promotion prospects, but it is not our policy to release details of such action. It is also the responsibility of senior officers to ascertain what lessons can be learnt from such incidents. Central records are not maintained.

Reports on breaches by foreign aircrew are passed to the relevant national authorities, with whom responsibility for any further action rests.

Details of confirmed breaches for 1996 have yet to be collated.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the maximum manoeuvres permitted by a military aircraft which is subjected to (a) a pre-briefed and (b) an unbriefed interception by a fighter aircraft in the United Kingdom airspace while flying (i) in the military low flying system (ii) between 2,000 and 5,000 ft and (iii) above 5,000 ft. [8603]

Mr. Soames: The maximum manoeuvres permitted vary according to the type of military aircraft being flown.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made since August 1995 to flow control in the low flying system in the area between Northampton and Sywell airfield; and what were the reasons for those changes. [8588]

Mr. Soames: Due to the urban expansion of Northampton north-eastwards towards Northampton/Sywell airfield, the area between these locations is no longer available for military low flying and the unidirectional flow has therefore been removed.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made since August 1995 to flow control in the low flying system in the area between Doncaster and Sandtoft airfield; and what were the reasons for those changes. [8601]

Mr. Soames: Following the closure of the military air traffic zone around RAF Finningley on 1 October 1995, a north-north-westerly unidirectional flow was introduced in the gap between the Sheffield transit area and Sandtoft airfield to improve flight safety at low level.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions are contained in the "UK Military Low Flying Handbook" concerning the use by aircrew transiting the gap between Newcastle and Spadeadam of an air traffic radar service from RAF Spadeadam. [8589]

Mr. Soames: None.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made since August 1995 to flow control in the low flying system in the Bedford area; and what was the reasons for those changes. [8591]

Mr. Soames: Due to a reduction in the amount of controlled airspace around Bedford airfield, airspace to the north of Bedford town became available for military low flying. To improve flight safety at low level, a westerly unidirectional flow was introduced between these two locations.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to publish the results of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency study of the probability of mid-air collisions in the low-level airspace; and when. [8599]

Mr. Soames: We will respond to the air accidents investigation branch—AAIB—once we have received DERA's report and have had the opportunity to consider it fully. Our response to the AAIB will be a matter of public record.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates of those accidents to Jaguar, Harrier and Tornado aircraft since 1990 which the subsequent inquiry concluded would have been prevented if ground proximity warning systems had been fitted to the aircraft. [8586]

Mr. Soames: It is not possible to report which accidents might have been avoided by installation of a ground proximity warning system as such hypothetical assessments fall outside the terms of reference of RAF boards of inquiry.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made since August 1995 to the structure of the low flying system in the Salisbury plain area; and what were the reasons for those changes. [8592]

Mr. Soames: The previous boundaries of low flying areas 1A, 1B and 1C used a mixture of geographic features and lines of latitude and longitude to delineate the areas. Changes were made in April and August 1996 so that significant line features such as the M4, A34, A41 (T) and other roads were adopted as boundaries to facilitate the management and conduct of low-level helicopter operations.

Sea Harrier Collision

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the mid-air collision 19 September between a Royal Navy Sea Harrier and a Dutch F-16; and what plans he has to issue a summary of the inquiry report on this accident. [8598]

Mr. Soames: On 19 September 1996, a Royal Navy Sea Harrier and a Dutch F-16 touched in mid-air while conducting air combat training manoeuvres off Portland Bill. This resulted in damage to the nose of the Sea Harrier and to the tail of the F-16. Neither pilot sustained injuries, and both aircraft recovered safely to RNAS Yeovilton.

A board of inquiry was convened to investigate the incident in conjunction with the Dutch authorities. Once this process is complete, a summary of the findings of the board of inquiry will be placed in the Library of the House.

Christmas Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how much his Department will spend on Christmas trees and decorations this year; how many Christmas trees will be bought for his Department's headquarters; and what are the type and country of origin of the trees; [7569]

(2) how much his Department plans to spend on celebrating Christmas and the new year. [7584]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 6 December 1996]: About £1,300 is to be spent on official Christmas cards. There will also be some associated postage costs. There are otherwise no plans for official expenditure on Christmas and the new year.

Overseas Police Training

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list, for each year since 1980, those overseas countries in which police forces have received support for training from his budget. [8026]

Mr. Soames: Records of training provided in the UK were not held centrally before September 1993 and information before that date is incomplete. There is no record of UK training of civilian police forces being funded by my Department since that date, although training has been carried out, funded either by other Government Departments or the countries themselves.

Detailed records of training provided overseas are not maintained centrally. However, from the early 1980s until 30 June 1996, my Department did part-fund loan service personnel in the Caribbean who, among other duties, provided training for police special service units in Antigua and Barbuda, Barbados, Dominica, Grenada, St. Kitts and Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Caribbean Dependent Territories. Since June the training, though still conducted by members of the armed forces, has been wholly funded by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Convicted Service Men (Cyprus)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of the case of the three British service men convicted of manslaughter of the Danish tour guide in Cyprus. [8516]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 26 November 1996, Official Report, columns 199–200.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what was his Department's total contribution to the defence costs of three British troops based in Cyprus who were convicted of the manslaughter of a Danish tour guide; and if he will make a statement; [8698]

(2) if he will list what payments his Department is making to each of the three British service men who are at present serving a life sentence for the manslaughter of the Danish tour guide in Cyprus. [8724]

Mr. Soames: There has been no change in the position outlined in my answers of 20 May 1996, Official Report, column 52, and 4 June 1996, Official Report, column 334.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the terms of the discharge from the British Army that were given to the three British service men convicted of the manslaughter of the Danish tour guide in Cyprus. [8640]

Mr. Soames: The three individuals were discharged in April this year under paragraph 9.404 of Queen's Regulations for the Army for misconduct having been sentenced by a civil court to imprisonment.

RAF Spadeadam

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if military aircraft inbound to the RAF Spadeadam range at low level from the east are permitted to cross the area of directional flow control west of Newcastle in a westerly direction (a) while receiving a radar advisory service from RAF Spadeadam and (b) when not in receipt of any air traffic service. [8587]

Mr. Soames: No. Compliance with flow arrows is mandatory for all low military aircraft, except helicopters flying below 250 feet above ground level, irrespective of whether they are receiving a radar advisory service.

Canadian Forces Base, Goose Bay

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates of deployment and units involved for each deployment of non-flying units to Canadian forces base, Goose bay in 1995 and 1996; and what plans he has for further non-flying unit training deployments to Goose bay. [8595]

Mr. Soames: Dates of deployment and units involved for each deployment of non-flying units to Goose bay in 1995 and 1996 are as follows:

26 January to 26 February 1995: Composite deployment from various RAF regiment units.

14 January to 13 February 1996: Composite deployment from various RAF regiment units.

Plans for further non-flying unit deployments to Goose bay are:

4 January to 9 January 1997: Composite deployment from elements of 5 Airborne Brigade.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties were flown by each Royal Air Force aircraft type at Canadian forces base, Goose bay in 1996. [8593]

Mr. Soames: Royal Air Force aircraft have flown 800 training sorties at Goose bay in 1996; 782 of these were by Tornado GR1 aircraft and 18 by Hercules aircraft.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the squadrons which carried out training at Canadian forces base, Goose bay in 1996; and what were the deployment dates for each squadron. [8594]

Mr. Soames: The information on flying squadron deployments is as follows:

Number 47 Squadron: 14 January to 20 January 1996

Number IX Squadron: 12 April to 3 May 1996

Number 617 Squadron: 3 May to 24 May 1996

Number 17 Squadron: 24 May to 14 June 1996

Number 11 (AC) Squadron: 24 August to 13 September 1996

Number 14 Squadron: 13 September to 4 October 1996

Number 13 Squadron: 4 October to 18 October 1996.

Nimrod Aircrew

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the changes to training, procedures and regulations for Nimrod aircrew following the findings of the board of inquiry into the accident in September 1995. [8597]

Mr. Soames: I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Jaguar Aircraft (Accident)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the accident to Jaguar No. XZ396 in 1995; what was the damage category of the aircraft; at what location repairs were undertaken; and on what date the aircraft re-entered service. [8605]

Mr. Soames: As a result of an incident in 1995, Jaguar XZ396 received category 3 damage which was repaired at RAF Coltishall. The aircraft was returned to service on 23 April 1996.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the circumstances of the accident involving a Royal Air Force Jaguar in Alaska on 24 July. [8604]

Mr. Soames: The aircraft was participating in Cope Thunder, a major United States air force exercise designed to provide aircrew with the opportunity to develop advanced tactics and procedures in joint air operations, when it crashed some 40 miles north of Anchorage, Alaska. The pilot ejected safely. An RAF board of inquiry has been convened to determine the cause of this accident and consider what action may be necessary to minimise the risk of recurrence.

Joint Rapid Deployment Force

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the ability of the JRDF to utilise current British Army communications systems. [8349]

Mr. Soames: Units drawn from all three services are assigned to the joint rapid deployment force and are equipped and trained to use their own communications systems.

RAF Boulmer

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the capability of RAF Boulmer to provide an air traffic radar service to military aircraft operating at low level over Northumberland. [8590]

Mr. Soames: As an air defence unit, RAF Boulmer is neither manned nor equipped to offer an air traffic radar service to military aircraft operating at low level over Northumberland.

Tornado Aircraft

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the purpose of the deployment of Tornados from the 38 fighter-bomber wing, German air force, to RAF Coningsby during January 1996; how many sorties were flown; how many of these were at low level; and how many practice attacks were made on UK ranges. [8606]

Mr. Soames: The purpose of the deployment was to conduct a flight trial to test the compatibility of an electronic countermeasures system with the aircraft. A total of seven sorties were flown, none of which was at low level. No practice attacks were made on UK ranges.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on which United Kingdom airfield is to be the base for Royal Air Force Tornado squadrons relocating from Germany; and what is the planned date for relocation. [8600]

Mr. Soames: I hope to make an announcement in the new year about the redeployment of the Tornado squadrons from RAF Bruggen following its closure in 2002.

Gulf War (Injections)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many injections classified as secret were given to each individual Gulf war service man; [8450]

(2) how many service men in the Gulf war received injections which were classified as secret and were not listed on the medical documents of each service man; [8452]

Mr. Horam: In 1997–98 Sheffield health authority will receive an integrated allocation of £270.5 million, a cash increase of £9 million—3.45 per cent.—which represents a real terms growth of £3.7 million—1.42 per cent.

In 1997–98 Sheffield health authority will receive a general allocation of £257.2 million, a cash increase of £8.4 million—3.38 per cent.—which represents a real terms growth of £3.4 million—1.35 per cent.

This is indeed funding which can be used for Sheffield's hospital trusts. It is for individual health authorities to decide the level and type of services purchased, in partnership with general practitioners locally.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to ensure that there is no conflict of interest between the duties of the new head of the private finance initiative and his responsibilities as a senior executive of Tarmac plc. [8431]

Mr. Horam: There is no possibility of a conflict of interest arising from the appointment of Mr. Robert Osborne as head of the private finance unit of the national health service executive. Approval of business cases for private finance initiative schemes is not part of Mr. Osborne's responsibilities. Nor will he have any advisory role in schemes in which Tarmac has an interest.

NHS Executives

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what terms he approved the provision of a vehicle to Mr. John Greetham in his role as chair of the Yorkshire and North regional NHS executive; and how many other regional executive chairs receive a similar benefit. [8607]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) on 24 June at column 22.

Overseas Adoption Helpline

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what Government funding has been made available to the overseas adoption helpline in each year since 1992; what Government funding is planned for 1998 to 2000; and if he will make a statement. [8520]

Mr. Burns: Financial support for the overseas adoption helpline since 1992 is as follows:

1992–93: £80,834
1993–94: £96,000
1994–95: £96,000
1995–96: £96,000
1996–97: £50,000

There are currently no plans to provide further funding after 31 March 1997.

Computer Software

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the contract to supply computer software to the Chelsea and Westminster hospital was put out to tender. [8432]

Mr. Horam: The Riverside acute unit, now known as the Chelsea and Westminster Healthcare NHS trust, issued the invitation to tender in December 1993 in the Official Journal of the European Communities.

Renal Dialysis Machines

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many renal dialysis machines there are per health authority; and how many renal patients on dialysis there are in each health authority. [8500]

Mr. Horam: The information is not available centrally in the form requested. However, the number of haemodialysis stations in hospitals in each national health service region for 1993 is contained in the "National Review of Renal Services Part ll; Evidence for the Review". The number of renal patients on dialysis in each NHS region in 1993, by renal unit, is shown in the same document. Copies of the report are available in the Library.

Ambulance Services

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the size of the ambulance fleet by ambulance service in each of the last five years. [8504]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is not collected centrally. However, the second report of the Health Committee in Session 1994–95, copies of which are in the Library, contains some information on numbers of emergency ambulances.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on new ambulances by ambulance trust in each of the last five years. [8487]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Intensive Care Provision

Mr. Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) intensive care units, (b) intensive care beds, (c) paediatric intensive units and (d) paediatric intensive care beds there are by district health authority area. [8499]

Mr. Horam: Information on the provision of adult intensive care provision is not collected in the form requested. Information on the average daily number of available beds by broad ward classification for each national health service trust is published annually in "Bed Availability for England", copies of which are available in the Library.

Information on the number of paediatric intensive care units and beds is not routinely collected at present. However a survey of paediatric intensive care provision was undertaken earlier this year and the results published in a report on 29 May. This report by the chief executive of the national health service executive is entitled, "Paediatric Intensive Care" and is available in the Library.

Pay Beds

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many pay beds there were by NHS executive region in each of the last five years. [8503]

Mr. Horam: Pay beds have not been centrally authorised since 31 March 1991 and the Department has not collected information on pay bed numbers since then.
